An Edition of Vainglory

Rosemary Proctor

Vainglory appears in folios 83r–84v of the Exeter Book, between The Seafarer and Widsith.¹ According to Conner, it belongs to the second, oldest booklet of the Exeter Book, the production of which may have just predated or coincided with the Benedictine reform of Exeter, beginning in 968.² To briefly summarize, the fulcrum of the poem is the dichotomy its speaker draws between God’s child, whose main virtue is humility, and the devil’s child, whose main sin is immoderate pride. This is not to say that Vainglory possesses an immediately lucid didactic structure. Notoriously elliptical, the poem is a frustrating read; but one which, I suggest, repays the effort spent. Editors and critics have had to contend with a confounding array of ambiguities: an unnamed ‘prophet’ and/or ‘wise man’ who is the original source of the speaker’s wisdom; uncertainty as to how many wise men or prophets are referred to; a host of uniquely attested forms;³ lines which seem to make no sense without emendation; and an apparently paraphrased, assumedly biblical gyd (51b), the end of which is not clear, and which may be something completely different from the initial gealdre (5a) mentioned. Further, it is difficult to decide what Vainglory is, in the main, ‘about’. As such, the poem has proven something of a struggle to name. First printed in Thorpe’s edition as Monitory Poem,⁴ numerous titles were then proposed: Ettmüller’s Be monna mòde (‘About the Mind

---

³ Bernard F. Huppé, The Web of Words: Structural Analyses of the Old English Poems ‘Vainglory’, ‘The Wonder of Creation’, ‘The Dream of the Rood’, and ‘Judith’ (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1970), p. 8. According to Huppé, the uniquely attested forms are: sundorwundra (2b), arcwide (4b), wilgest (7a), meapelhengendra (13b), aescstede (17a), ungemededam (25a), fitgeplum (27a), broadad (28a), bod (29b), blenceb (33a), hinderhoca (34a), hygegar (34b), inwitflan (37b), symbolwlonc (40a), brefte (42a), nearowrencum (44a), fordspellum (47a), grundfedne (49a), ahlenead (53b), neosifum (55a); baelced (28a) may be an uniquely attested form or ‘represent only an unusual usage.’

of Men’), followed by Grein; Sedgefield's underwhelming A Bad Character, Mackie’s A Warning against Pride, later adopted by Guntner; finally, Krapp and Dobbie’s Vainglory, followed by all other editors thereafter, excepting Guntner. Huppé has suggested the subtitle Godes bearn — Feondes bearn, or Son of God — Son of Satan. Roberts was concerned that none of these titles takes into account the role of the speaker's teacher, putting forward The Wise-Man, or something similar. Vainglory is, in fact, the best of all possible titles, as the poem is essentially a homily on inordinate pride. The ‘inordinate’ is important, since this is not simply ‘A Warning Against Pride’, but a warning against excessive and ultimately futile pride.

Several dissertations discussing Vainglory were presented in the early nineteen-sixties and seventies, after which the poem experienced a brief surge in popularity. After Huppé’s edition (1970) came Markwardt and Rosier’s (1972) and Pickford’s (1974). The poem was translated in Shippey’s Poems of Wisdom and Learning in Old English (1976), and, with a couple of decades later, Rodrigues’ Anglo-Saxon Didactic Verse. Troublingly, Rodrigues often appears to ignore the seventies critics. For instance, an assertion made by Krapp and Dobbie and disproved by numerous later editors that the poem’s introductory lines ‘seem to bear no organic relationship to the rest of the poem’, is echoed by Rodrigues in his short introduction. Regan’s (1970) article on the patristic memes drawn upon by the poem made an invaluable contribution to scholarship, but I argue here that Vainglory’s ‘Germanic psychology’ ought too to be acknowledged. Roberts’ recent discussion of the poem has done much to collate

---

10 Huppé, pp. 1–7.

11 Roberts, pp. 120–21.

15 Thomas A. Shippey (Cambridge: Boydell & Brewer).

16 Louis J. Rodrigues (Felinfach: Llanerch, 1995).

the disparate scholarly opinions surrounding it.¹⁹ Before this, the latest article devoted to the poem was McKinnell’s, published in 1991.²⁰ The comparative paucity of interest in the poem since the seventies has meant that no comprehensive edition exists which takes all of the work done by its editors into account. New ways of approaching the poem have been put forward, as part of wider studies, by Conner, Magennis and Mize.²¹ A reconsideration of the poem, which integrates these into its analysis, is needed.

The edition and translation which I present here are preceded by two essays investigating the connective tissue of the poem — those thematic ligaments which animate its framework. The first essay focuses on the transmission of knowledge from prophet to speaker and the nexus in which the gyd exists; the second on the poem’s employment of satire and the psychomachia allegory, and its depiction of time and space. Both essays discuss Vainglory’s conception of the word. Vainglory is frustrating and rewarding in equal measure for the same reason: the poem is essentially preoccupied with perception — especially the perception of truth in word — and, accordingly, is an exercise in perceptive and interpretative ability.

The Prophet and the Speaker

‘The poem begins simply enough’, claims Huppé.²² A perfunctory glance at the widely varying ways in which its first four lines have been translated proves him wrong. These lines provide the scaffold of authority on which the poem is constructed. They are by no means ‘simple’, and are in need of reconsideration. This essay aims to provide a plausible re-reading which removes the ‘wise man’ element, and asserts that there is just one authority figure — a prophet — who has imparted wisdom to the speaker. An elision of prophets in the recurrent noun witega (3b, 50b, 81b) will also suit my analysis. I hope to show here that gealdre (6a) probably has the same referent as the gyd (51b) the speaker later quotes. The gyd likely has a source in Luke 14.11, Luke 18.14, and ends at line 56. The prophet may well be John the Baptist; if there is another prophet, he may be Isaiah. This, in Roberts’ words, is a text in which ‘the reception, interiorization, and passing on of wisdom’ is of great concern.²³ Audience or critic must, then, provide the next link in the chain of wisdom set in motion by the witega.

The poem’s introductory lines are usually taken to mean that the teachings of some authority figure, ‘witgan larum’ (3b), have been passed on to the speaker by a wise man, or ‘frod wita’ (1a). A reading involving a wise man encounters difficulty at 81b: ‘gif me se witega ne leag’ (if the prophet did not lie to me). Line 81b asserts a direct transference of knowledge from the witega to the speaker, just as has been asserted in 1–2a. It is reasonable to assume that witega refers to the same figure throughout the poem. If this is the case, 81b begs the question, where did the wise man go? Roberts, following Pickford and Hansen, has approached this problem by suggesting that the roles of wise man and prophet are conflated in witega at 81b.²⁴ There need, however, be no wise man at all when larum is taken as an instrumental dative, modified by the genitive witgan, to form the phrase, ‘with the lore of a witega. A man might, in present-day English, apply a bandage with the skills of a professional. He has not been instructed in applying the bandage by a professional: rather, he applies the bandage with the skills that are in accordance with the professional that he is. The phrase ‘witgan larum’ is attested once elsewhere, in Exodus (390b): Solomon builds a temple in accordance with ‘witgan larum’, the witega being David.²⁵ This opens up the further possibility that, in Vainglory, one witega, or prophet, is fulfilling the lore of another.

---

²² Huppé, p. 9.
²³ Roberts, p. 128.

Three types of knowledge are referred to in the first four lines: ‘sundorwundra fela’ (many special portents [2b]), ‘witgan larum’ and ‘bodan ærcwide’ (4b). The witega is able to interpret portents; these may be a part of his lore. His lore could be based on what an earlier figure has said or prophesied the witega will do. This is transformed into ‘bodan ærcwide’. A hapax legomenon, ærcwide could feasibly mean either ‘foretelling’ or ‘early speech’.²⁶ Some translations have ‘ancient language’.²⁷ I incline towards the first interpretation, but I would also like to suggest that ærcwide is a pun, the secondary meaning of which is ‘early speech’, recalling the ‘witgan larum’ which has been utilized to produce the ærcwide. This is why ‘bodan ærcwide’ parallels ‘witgan larum’ in structure as genitive + dative, and is placed in such a way as to be taken either as appositive to wordhord or to ‘witgan larum’. As it is singular, I have translated it as appositive to wordhord, but have tried to preserve its secondary meaning with the addition of ‘long ago’. It is probable that witega functions, in Vainglory, much as it does in a sermon by Ælfric of Eynsham: ‘þa heahfæderas and þa witegan þe embe þone Hælend cyddon, þa waeron þa sederas þe seowan Godes lare’ (‘the patriarchs and the prophets made announcements concerning the Saviour; they were the sowers who sowed God’s lore’).²⁸ ‘Witgan larum’ and ‘bodan ærcwide’ may refer, at the same time, to earlier and later knowledge. They affirm the genealogy of prophecy from which the poem can claim descent.

Hansen and Roberts share the opinion that, at 81b, the poem may question the reliability ‘of authors and authorities’, although neither think that the witega is false.²⁹ There is little, except the immediately apparent meaning of 81b, to substantiate this claim. The first four lines leave no doubt as to the witega’s credentials. Wordhord, as Mize has shown, refers to a ring-fenced repository of sapiential, ‘ethically positive’ discourse within the mind.³⁰ Further, the witega is said to be ‘beorn boca gleaw’ (4a). Drout, discussing the phrase’s appearance in The Gifts of Men, has made the point that boca, qualifying gleaw, further qualifies the man the phrase denotes, as a conveyer of monastic wisdom.³¹ A glance at the appearances of ‘boca gleaw’ in the corpus suggests a generalized meaning of ‘religious teacher’, similar to the circumlocution ‘man of the cloth’ for ‘priest’ in present-day English. The phrase also appears in Elene (1211a), The Meters of Boethius (Meter 1, line 52a) and Aldhelm (2a), referring respectively to Cyriacus, Boethius and Aldhelm.³² The figures who bear this epithet are all

²⁶ Muir, II, 538.
²⁷ Mackie, p. 11; Rodrigues, p. 83.
²⁹ Roberts, p. 128; Hansen, p. 80.
³⁰ Mize, pp. 70–71.
³¹ Drout, p. 457.
³² The Vercelli Book, ed. by George Philip Krapp, Anglo-Saxon Poetic Records, 2 (New York: Columbia University agents of conversion, or 'spreading the word', especially about Christ. Wordhord proves that there can be nothing mendacious about the witega or his knowledge. 'Beorn boca gleaw' indicates that this knowledge will be sacred, and not secular. Line 81b is, in fact, an affirmation of the witega’s ultimate authority, to which the speaker defers. It is a didactic tool, the rhetorical employment of an element of doubt which paradoxically asserts validity; a vaguely aggressive challenge designed to provoke submission from a lesson’s recipient.

Gealdre (6a) is a word that has caused concern. Gunter states that gealdor is ‘always associated with pagan sorcery and out of place in a Christian sermon’.³³ Roberts has proven that this is not the case, but concludes that gealdre and the later gyd need not be equated.³⁴ I contest this with a few select examples, some referred to by Roberts. In Christ a giedd made by Job is related: ‘Bi þongiedd awraec ïob, […] ond hine fugel neme, I þone Iudeas ongietan ne meahtan’ (‘about [Christ] Job made a prediction […] and he named him “bird”, which the Jews could not understand’).³⁵ Giedd is functioning here in the same way that gealdor does in, for example, Beowulf: ‘Siððanhie Hygelaces hornondbyman, | gealdorongeaton’ (‘after they heard the sound of Hygelac’s horn and trumpets’),³⁶ in Roberts’ own words, ‘heralding the arrival of a hero about to enter legend’.³⁷ In Guthlac B, gealdor refers again to a prediction: ‘nis ðe ende feor, I ðæs ðæ ic on galdrum ongieten hæbbe’ (‘your end is not far; I have understood this in [your] divinations’).³⁸ Hrothgar calls the ‘sermon’ with which he exhorts Beowulf that he should guncyste ongit (“heed virtue”) a gyd (1723).³⁹ If it is acceptable, in The Fates of the Apostles, for Cynewulf to refer to the same poem with giddes (89a) and galdres (108a),⁴⁰ it is eminently possible that, in Vainglory, they have the same referent. Gealdor, prototypically magical, imbues gyd with supernatural reverberations.

Pickford, noticing the ond at 51b, has also concluded that gealdor and gyd are separate utterances.⁴¹ This all depends on how the þæt in 50b is to be taken. Twice in the poem so far, at 26a and 47b, þæt has referred to the devil’s child. Since 41b–51a, the lines immediately preceding ‘þæt se witga song’, were a description of the devil’s child, it is probable that the þæt of 50b is not referring to all that has come before, but the devil’s child: his ‘sort’. The devil’s child is not a delineated character in the text; rather, he is a gnomic sum ‘one sort’ (23b). Singan can take a direct object and still possess the implied preposition, ‘about’, as in the Old English Bede: ‘cwæð he: singmefrumsceaft’ (‘he said: “sing me creation”’).⁴² The two verbs singan and awreccan may denote the separate processes of composition and utterance, which is how I have them in my translation, gearowyrdig implying preparedness and readiness with

---

³³ Gunter, p. 13.
³⁵ Krapp and Dobbie, The Exeter Book, p. 20 (lines 633–37). Translations are my own, unless otherwise stated.
³⁷ Roberts, p. 127.
³⁸ Krapp and Dobbie, The Exeter Book, p. 84 (lines 1206b–7).
³⁹ Klaeber, p. 100.
⁴¹ Pickford, 26.
words; or they may both refer to either. In neither case need ond create a disparity between gealdor and gyd.

This utterance, however, may potentially remain obscure. Pickford has pointed out that the modifying adjective sundor and the noun gescead (8b) imply the interpretive processes of separation and distinction. Words must be split, and truth extracted from them. I am in agreement with Hansen when she suggests that the poem’s ellipsis ‘may reflect the threat of chaos and meaninglessness that words at once control and reveal’. The verb ongietan is notably present in all but one of the occurrences of gyd and gealdor given above. Ongietan denotes the processing of sensory information: seeing and hearing on the one hand, but also cognizance — perceiving and understanding — on the other. The verb possesses both connotations simultaneously in the instance of Hygelac’s horn and trumpets. Further, when it is used in Hrothgar’s gyd, it is imperative, implying that its audience may well come away having learned nothing of virtue. Ongietan is negative in Christ: the Jews cannot discern Christ’s coming from the words of Job. Words, even prophetic ones, are fallible, potentially ineffectual media. This is felt with the insertion of soðlice ‘truly’ (5a), and indeed, meahte ‘could’ (5b) to Vainglory’s introductory lines. The truth present in the gealdor’s words has the potential to remain obscure: to be heard, but not heeded. Whereas a pronouncement on the fallibility of authorities is, Hansen cautiously accepts, ‘more like something we would expect from Chaucer, at the earliest, than from an Old English poet’, numerous Anglo-Saxon texts express concern about the effective transmission of knowledge through word, Riddle 47 (whose solution is ‘bookworm’) being the most obvious.

It is unlikely that the poet has made the witega up. Vainglory is part of a textual culture in which the imprinting of texts with the watermark of authority for the purposes of ‘affiliation and validation’ is of immense importance. The witega, then, is probably designed to recall a known figure of authority. Regan and McKinnell identify the witega as the apostle John. The former considers the poem to draw from 1 John 3. The latter suggests a commentary on 1 John 3, most likely Bede’s In Epistolas Septem Catholicas, but concedes that witega does not ever refer to an apostle; it is most often an epithet for Old Testament prophets, is extant referring to John the Baptist, and, infrequently, to Christ. Roberts puts forward Isaiah. Huppé cannot name the prophet, but notes that patristic commentaries on the Vulgate Psalm 35:12 are in line with the poem’s content as a whole. The most compelling argument for the poem’s source material is provided by Trahern; this is taken as definitive by Fulk and Cain. Trahern puts forward as a main source Chapter I of The Rule of Chrodegang, which is based on Chapter 4 of St Caesarius of Arles’ ‘Sermo CCXXXIII’. Rule, ‘Sermo’ and Vainglory (52–

---

43 Pickford, 18, 19.
44 Hansen, p. 77.
45 Hansen, p. 80.
48 Regan, p. 324, n. 1.
49 McKinnell, 79.
50 Roberts, p. 128.
53 Joseph B. Trahern Jr., ‘Caesarius, Chrodegang, and the Old English Vainglory’, in *Gesellschaft, Kultur, Literatur: 56
56) all distinguish God’s child and the devil’s by use of the quotation ‘omnis qui se exaltat, humiliabitur, et qui se humiliat, exaltabitur’ (‘everyone who exalts himself shall be humbled, and everyone who humbles himself shall be exalted’).54 Trahern’s argument is the springboard for my own.

I can find two instances in the Vulgate at which the exact verse appears: Luke 14.11, 18.14; in Matt 23.12, the tense is future perfect.55 A West-Saxon Gospel uses similar vocabulary to Vainglory: ‘for þam ælc þe hine up ahefð bið genyðerud; and se þe hine nyðerað, se bið up ahafen’ (Luke 14.11).56 The idea expressed by these verses is what Yamasaki calls ‘the paradoxical truth: greatness in the Kingdom involves the opposite of what human wisdom would dictate.’57 Luke 14.11 and 18.14 are sometimes taken by patristic writers to refer back to a prophecy made by Isaiah concerning the ministry of John the Baptist. Meanwhile, Luke 3.4–5 is perhaps alluded to in ‘witgan larum’:

Sicut scriptum est in libro sermonum Esaiae prophetae: vox clamantis in deserto: parate viam Domini rectas facite semitas eius. Omnis vallis implebitur; et omnis mons et collis humiliabitur; et erunt prava in directa; et aspera in vias planas.58

As it was written in the book of the sayings of Isaiah the prophet: A voice of one crying in the wilderness: Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his paths. Every valley shall be filled; and every mountain and hill shall be brought low; and the crooked shall be made straight; and the rough ways plain.

Caesarius quotes Luke 14.11 and 18.14 elsewhere, in chapter 4 of ‘Sermo CCXVII’. Here, he considers only its first half, as does Vainglory. This, Caesarius asserts, is quod alius ‘the same thing’ as Is 40.4.59

John the Baptist only repeats Is 40.3 (cf. Matt 3.3, John 1.23), but it is not unheard of for exegetes to put words into the mouths of prophets. Peter Chrysologus, for instance, holds an imagined conversation with John the Baptist in his ‘Sermo CLXXIX’.60 So too may Vainglory’s speaker be entering into a dialogue with John through the scriptures. Pickford has noted the apocalyptic resonance the speaker has added to lines 52–56.61 The first addition is ‘in þa slíþnan tid’ (‘in that terrible hour’ [52b]), amplified by a similar expression, and otherwise unattested form, neosifum (‘the ultimate journey’). It is tempting to suggest that wyrmum (56b) contains an echo of John’s words to the Pharisees in Matthew 3.7: ‘progenies viperarum

---

55 All references to the Vulgate are taken from <http://www.drbo.org/>.
58 Cf. Is. 40.3–4.
quis demonstravit vobis fugere a futura ira?’ (‘ye brood of vipers, who hath shewed you to flee from the wrath to come’?). Caesarius’ ‘Sermo CCXVII’ may have circulated in Anglo-Saxon England.\(^{62}\) Whether or not it did, however, it provides a useful demonstration of the exegetical nexus in which these verses exist. Caesarius explores the verses’ apocalyptic implications: ‘clamor iudicium comminatur’ (the shout of judges threatens). The phrase ‘veniet tempus’ (‘a time will come’) is repeated. Caesarius’ warning that ‘Non semper iste, qui nunc est, humanae consuetudinis ordo servabitur’ (‘the order of man’s condition will not always be kept the same as it is now’), parallels that of \textit{Vainglory}: ‘bip [æs oær swice’ (‘there will be another outcome’ [31b]) to sinful behaviour.

\textit{Ælfric}, in his ‘Nativitas Sancti Iohannis Baptistae’, equates Isaiah 4.3–44 with Luke 14.11 and 18.14 in a passage based on Gregory the Great’s ‘Homily XX’.\(^{63}\) He makes two notable deviations from his source. The first is a possible recollection of Isaiah 57.15: ‘in hwam gerest godes gæst buton on þam eadmodum?’ (‘in whom resteth the Spirit of God but in the humble?’), echoing \textit{Vainglory}’s assertion that Christ shall be a \textit{geist gegæderad} ‘spirit united’ (80a) within the humble man.\(^{64}\) The next deviation is of especial interest to this analysis:

\[
\text{ðwyrnyssa beoð gerihte þonne ðwyrlicra manna heortan þe beoð þurh unrihtwisnyssye hocum awegde, eft þurh regolsticcan þære soþan rihtwisnyssye beoð geemmnode.}
\]

Crookednesses shall be straight, when the hearts of perverse men, which are agitated by the hooks of unrighteousness, are again made even by the ruling-rods of true righteousness.

\textit{Ælfric} employs the same unusual ‘hooks’ metaphor in another sermon: ‘þa worldmen cunnon þa worldcundan snoternysse, and þa yfelan hocas þe se Hælend onscurað’ (‘those men of the world know secular wisdom, and those evil hooks which the Saviour rejects’).\(^{65}\) This appears between the deployment of two biblical verses, Luke 16.8 and Corinthians 3.9, both of which relate the paradoxical truth. The former asserts that the children of the world (‘worlde bearn’) are wiser in their generation than the children of the light (‘leothes bearn’), a similar delineation as that between God’s child and the devil’s. The latter verse states that worldly wisdom is foolishness to God.

Pope surmises that the hooks in ‘Dominica X’ may be ‘something similar’ to those in Thorpe’s ‘Nativitas’\(^{66}\) As far as I am aware, it has gone unnoticed that \textit{Vainglory} may be using the same metaphor at lines 33b–34a: ‘worn geþenceþ/hinderhoca’. Immediately following this is a description, crucial to the psychomachia allegory, of missiles which assail the devil’s child. Verbs denoting thought govern the metaphor both here and in ‘Dominica X’. In ‘Nativitas’, hooks exist in the hearts of men. The ‘hooks’, then, are interior. In \textit{Vainglory}, \textit{gé Penguin} is unusually rhymed with the verbs preceding it — ‘wrence þ he ond blence þ’ (‘he plots and deceives’ [33a]) — implying continuity between intention and action: the plotting and deception refer at the same time to conception and reification. Herein is a schema central to the poem and its employment of the psychomachia allegory: that of ‘mind as fortress’ and, simultaneously, ‘fortress as mind’. The hall is an extension of the mind of the devil’s child, so what occurs within his mind will also occur in the hall. Comprised in _hinderhoca_ is a chain of knowledge — perception — action. The devil’s child plots against his Maker to let the devil into his mind. Rejecting the divine from his mind, and accepting Satan, his world-view becomes false: he plots against, and deceives, himself. This results in the devil’s child’s bad behavior in the hall, which will also involve plotting against, and deceiving, his fellow man.

_Vainglory_’s prophet has the ability to discern God’s child, and to separate him from the devil’s child. There is no prophet better equipped to relate both the sensory and cogitative information of God’s own child, implied by the verb _ongietan_, than the only prophet who, ‘Christum […] videre meruit et tenere; atque Pereunti mundo adipignare solus mundi meruit saluatorem’ (‘was counted worthy of both seeing and holding Christ […] worthy of pointing out to a world that was perishing the Savior of the world’).⁶⁸ The prophet’s knowledge, in _Vainglory_, has, in part, been taken from the interpretation of portentous signs. The prophet has further absorbed earlier prophetic teachings into himself, to produce his own brand of lore. As Caesarius of Arles puts it: ‘Sanctus, inquam, Johannes typum in se legis, quae longe Christum per signa et indicia monstrabat, ostendit’ (‘St John […] represented in himself a type of the law, which pointed out Christ from afar by signs and evidence’).⁶⁹ In Ælfric’s _Nativitas_, John is called _Stemn_ (‘Voice’), and Christ _Word_: ‘na swilc word swa menn sprecað, ac he is þæs fæder wisdom’ (‘not such a word as men speak, but he is the Wisdom of the Father’).⁷⁰ _Christ_ was not such a word as men speak, because such words are fallible. _Vainglory_’s speaker challenges an audience to see, as he himself has perceived through John’s ministry, the lore sown in the ground of language and, in turn through this, the Word within the word.

This essay has aimed to clarify some of the poem’s central ambiguities. The poem contains one foundational quotation, a paraphrase of Luke 14.11 and 18.14. This is both _gealdor_ and _gyd_, and expressive of the paradoxical truth. The quotation begins at line 52, and ends at line 56. It is passed from the prophet directly to the speaker, there being no ‘wise man’, although an earlier prophet’s lore may be present in the verse, likely Isaiah’s. The poet was probably inspired by the source material Trahern has suggested, but may also have had recourse to other texts which draw out the meaning of Luke 14.11 and 18.14. One prophet is especially associated with these verses: John the Baptist. They are further associated with the discernment of the proud versus the humble, God’s child versus the devil’s, and their fates at Judgment Day. These verses are also linked to the vernacular ‘hooks’ metaphor the speaker employs, which is inserted into exposition of the psychomachia allegory. The poet may have been influenced by Ælfric, or vice versa: it is impossible to say. Regardless, these ‘hooks’ seem to have a relationship with the paradoxical truth, and perhaps with the ministry of John the Baptist. What is more, this relationship seems to be an entirely Anglo-Saxon, vernacular

The placement of the poem in vernacular textual culture will be carried over into the next essay. So too will the next essay be informed by the psychic chain of knowledge — perception — action established here, present in hinderhoca. Also to be borne in mind is the poem’s preoccupation with words. Like the ‘special portents’ the prophet interprets, words are veiled media, from which truth must be extracted.

The Mind, the Hall, and Heaven

This essay will explore the worlds of Vainglory: the cultural world from which it was born, and the interior worlds it contains. Vainglory’s lens is in a state of contraction and expansion as it depicts in varying breadths enclosed spaces that are illustrative of the macrocosm. Here, I shall investigate how the spaces of mind, hall and heaven are integrated to produce a universal statement on the nature and outcome of vainglory: those who exalt themselves shall be humbled, and those who humble themselves shall be exalted. The first section of this essay will focus on lines 13–23b, the depiction of the feast before the devil’s child is introduced, to argue that this set-piece is functioning as a figure of a world full of opaque speech; a world in which truth may only be perceived if one’s interpretive capacities are fully honed. Next, I attempt to identify a satirical element in the poem, especially around the description of the devil’s child at 23b–44a. In these lines the hall transforms into a diabolic amplification of the mind of the devil’s child. Central to this is the verb lætan (10a, 34b, 37b, 40b), which facilitates the psychomachia allegory within the poem illustrative of the psychic chain of knowledge — perception — action discussed in the previous essay, which unifies mind and hall. Finally, I shall discuss how the space of heaven is reflective of both the mind of the devil’s child and the hall that that mind perceives, thus bringing together the poem’s worlds in macrocosmic fulfilment.

Opinions vary as to whether the depiction of the feast in Vainglory is intended to be derogatory. Further, if the speaker intends to denounce the men at the feast, does this amount to a condemnation of feasting and the cultural practices associated with it? For Regan, the feast scene is an example of ekphrasis, a didactic tableau favored by patristic writers. Shippey remarks that the tone of the feast scene ‘seems intentionally elegiac, even frustrated, rather than wicked’, concluding that ‘the poet is a trace equivocal in his attitude to the values of heroic society’. Hagen considers the speaker to suffer from no such ‘regretful nostalgia’; the noise of the feast is offensive to him. Markwardt and Rosier go as far as to compare the feast scene to Abraham’s words on Sodom in lines 2408–18 of Genesis A. A refreshing stance is taken by Magennis, who considers the feast scene to be a legitimately ‘lively picture of warriors enjoying themselves’. For Magennis, the feast is there to represent ‘in heightened form the moral dangers which people must be on their guard against in the world’. The central danger, I propose here, is the inability to perceive truth in word. This accords with Huppé’s observation, built into a discussion on the unique form maepelhergendra ‘speech-

---

72 Shippey, p. 9.
74 Marckwardt and Rosier, p. 219.
75 Magennis, p. 99.
76 Magennis, p. 102.
praisers’ (13b), that the poem is concerned with ‘the real value of speech, which lies not in speech itself but in the perception of the truth in speech’. ⁷⁷ The men in the hall, Huppé argues, worship ‘speech itself’, and are ignorant of its truth. ⁷⁸

Maþelhergendra is sometimes unnecessarily emended to the better attested form maepelhegend ‘holding conclave’. Maþelhegend is attested three times: once in Elene (279a), to describe a gathering of the wisest people among the Jews, and twice in Andreas, first used of the angelic group of seafarers (262b); next of the cannibalistic warrior-council (1096b). ⁷⁹ Maþelhergendra may well be designed to recall maþelhegend, so similar are the two forms: where men gather, speeches are praised. I follow Huppé in taking maþel- as an implied direct object of hergend: ‘those who praise speech’. It can also be taken as implied instrumental: ‘those who praise using speech’. Markwardt and Rosier interpret this as ‘boast-lovers’. ⁸⁰ Pickford also suggests that the compound may refer to ‘praising assemblies or speeches’; equally, it may denote ‘assemblies for self-praising or boasting’. ⁸¹ The poem is never so specific elsewhere. Although others have attempted to ascribe particular cultural practices to the speech in the hall, this can never go beyond speculation. Clover, for instance, has identified lines 13–44a as a description of a flyting. ⁸² Lines 11–12, in which men, excited by wine, strive to find an æscstede (‘battlefield’ [17a]) in the hall, could refer to an argument, to actual violence, or to the innocuous recounting of past martial exploits. ⁸³ The feast scene seems to have been designed not to depict certain cultural practices involving speech, but speech in general. Rather than denoting a specific ceremony, or to denigrate the men it describes, meþelhergendra establishes instead a world in which speech, especially formalized speech, is revered. In such a world, it is essential to split words, and extract truth. Maþelhergendra contains both an ethical and linguistic tension. The two are, in fact, the same thing: the tension between hearing and heeding.

There is no reason to assume that a Christian value-system is entirely absent from the hall. Soðgied ‘truth-tales’ (15b) is only attested here and in The Seafarer (1b) to describe the poem itself. ⁸⁴ Just as with the Seafarer, so may the men in Vainglory’s hall be reciting tales with both Christian and Germanic-heroic elements. The speech in the hall is the product of a collective social consciousness into which both Christian and Germanic-heroic values are integrated: a society in which heroic songs were sung at monastic feasts. ⁸⁵ Amidst the clamor of this society it may be impossible to perceive Christ: the Word within the word. As such, the speech-making at the feast soon descends into a meaningless roar of competing voices: ‘breahtem stigeð l cirm on corþre. Cwide scralletap, l missenlice’ (‘the noise mounts, the uproar in the throng. They call out, each with a speech of his own’ [19b–21a]). The closest parallel to this occurs in Guthlac B, when the saint is assailed by a crowd of fiends: ‘hwilum wedende swa wilde deor l cirmdon on corÔre’ (‘at times the raving ones would cry out like wild beasts

---

⁷⁷ Huppé, p. 12.
⁷⁸ Huppé, p. 12.
⁷⁹ Krapp, The Vercelli Book: Elene p. 73; Andreas pp. 10, 33.
⁸⁰ Markwardt and Rosier, p. 221.
⁸¹ Pickford, 20.
⁸³ Shippey, p. 128, n. 3.
This is not to say that the noise being made at the feast is demonic; rather, it is as unintelligible as the roar of an animal or the ravings of a lunatic, or indeed, the sound of a harp, which the only other attestation of scralletan — The Fortunes of Men — describes. The following assertion, that similarly, minds are divided into types (21b–22a) does not refer to the multiplicity of individual opinion present in the hall, but the contestation of voices there. Just as there are two types of men, equally, there are two types of speech, divine and worldly, but it is almost impossible to distinguish them in the hubbub. God's child and the devil's are made of flesh, and so too is worldly speech made of the same essential matter as divine speech: words.

The idea of the blurring of worldly and divine speech is touched upon by Pickford when he remarks that, amidst the cacophony of the feast, 'it is almost as if the poet is demonstrating the need of an interpreter such as the frod wita by whom he was taught'. The feast scene represents the mortal world; like the mortal world, it is a place in which truth may be lost in tale, in which perception must be honed. The devil's child's perception is fatally impaired. He is blind to the disdain of others: 'þenceð þæthiswisewelhwam þince|ealunforcuþ' ('he thinks that his behavior appears entirely reputable to everyone' [30–31b]). Further, 'he þa scylde ne wat l fæhpe gefremede' ('he does not know the guilt the enmity he has brought about' [35b–36a]); the other men in the hall do not like the devil's child. It is not that the devil's child conforms to hall-culture, but that he deforms it. Lines 28b–29 provide the clearest indication of the speaker's permissive attitude to hall-culture. This is the only instance in the poem in which the devil's child and his opposite are said to perform the same action: here, the devil's child 'boð his sylfes | swiþor micle þonne se sella mon' ('talks himself up far more than the better one does'). ‘Swiþormicle’ suggests that ‘se sella mon’ does participate in boasting, but to a reasonable and permissible degree. This and the very fact that such a man is present in the hall at all indicate that feasting, and the common cultural practices associated with it, are not necessarily iniquitous to the speaker. The article preceding sella implies that this man is someone different from whom it is later said that the devil's child hates, not 'the', but rather, 'his' better: 'feoþ his betran' (36b), which may be a reference to the lord of the hall functioning as a figure for God. This parallels the rebellious angels' rejection of God, 'their' better: 'forsawan hyra sellan' (61a). Just as the angels attempt to subvert the macrocosmic order, so does the devil's child overturn social order in the hall.

Conner has suggested that Vainglory is a satire recalling Carolingian models, the influence of which can especially be felt in the description of the devil's child at 23b–44a. Roberts dismisses this, partly due to the unsuccessful parallel Conner draws between the poem and Theodulf of Orléans' portrait of Cadac-Andréas. I do not wish to discount Conner's argument altogether. Just because the parallel with Theodulf proves unworkable does not mean that Vainglory cannot possess a satirical element, although I can find no evidence to suggest that it is directly influenced by Carolingian satirical models. The poem, broadly speaking, conforms to both the Mediterranean-Christian and Anglo-Saxon notions of humor. These are not at odds. According to Shanzer, 'Christian laughter' in the early Latin West

86 Krapp and Dobbie, The Exeter Book, p. 75 (lines 907–8a).
87 Krapp and Dobbie, The Exeter Book, p. 156 (line 83b).
88 Pickford, p. 6.
89 Conner, Anglo-Saxon Exeter, pp. 156–57.
‘inverted the fate of derisor and derise’. ⁹¹ Shanzer gives the only two examples of ridere ‘to laugh’ in the New Testament (Luke 6.21, 25) as evidence for this. ⁹² Both refer to the same variation on the paradoxical truth, that those who hunger shall be filled, and that those who weep shall laugh. This is strikingly similar, not only to the prophet’s gyd, but to Shippey’s definition of Anglo-Saxon humor: ‘often, indeed usually, the laugh is on those who laugh’. ⁹³ In her analysis of medieval parody, Bayless defines satire ‘simply as any form of literature, in verse or prose, which ridicules vice or folly’. ⁹⁴ Vainglory affords its audience a satirical laugh at the pride and folly of a man who is not aware of consequence, that ‘bǐp þæs oper swice’ (there will be another outcome of this [31b]). The audience knows what this end will be, and is invited to deride the devil’s child, confident that his pride will come before a fall.

Shippey claims that ‘a characteristic part of Anglo-Saxon humor is grim amusement from the wise at the expense of those who cannot understand words and do not share their vision of reality’. ⁹⁵ Further, in Anglo-Saxon humor, ‘the joke turns on recognizing the enormous differences of meaning between barely perceptible or imperceptible differences of sound’. ⁹⁶ Lætan is a brilliant illustration of this. The occurrence of the verb at 10a has perplexed editors. Lines 9–12 appear to say that anyone who lets drunkenness and lusts of the mind mar him in his thoughts can easily understand the gealdor. Usually, editors resolve this problem by placing a negative particle before leteð (10a). Huppé argues that emendation is not necessary, since conflated in leatan are two verbs with the separate meanings of ‘allow’ and ‘prevent’. ⁹⁷ A closer examination of how lætan is working in the poem will prove him right. The deliberately obscure choice of verb at 10a is challenging the reader to tread carefully, to contest what he sees as immediately obvious and, instead, to look deeper. Men may easily understand the significance of the gealdor if they prevent inebriation and ‘modes gælsan’ (‘lusts of the mind’ [11b]) from impairing their faculties, when there are many ‘speech-praisers’ in the hall (9–14): men who, potentially, may take speech only at face-value. The devil’s child leteð forth a mind-dart (34b), leteð missiles penetrate God’s fortress (37b–39), and leteð out words, inebriated (40b–41). The alternative meaning contained within the verb here casts his actions into stark relief: it implies that God’s child withholds mind-darts, prevents missiles from penetrating God’s fortress and does not speak too loosely or drink too much. In this sense, God’s child and devil’s child, who, on the surface, look and sound the same, are both present within lætan.

According to Shippey, in Anglo-Saxon humor, ‘part of the joke is always on the fool who sees only the obvious meaning’, ⁹⁸ in which case, the joke is certainly on the devil’s child, who has, figuratively, apprehended the verb of 10b and used it in exactly the opposite sense to how it is intended there. The joke here may also be on the reader, who takes this verb at face value. Lætan is a natural progression of scyldum bescyredne (8a): here the humble man’s opposite,

---

⁹² Shanzer, p. 29.

⁹⁶ Ibid, p. 45.

⁹⁸ Shippey, ‘Grim Wordplay’, p. 44.
‘pone wacran’ (‘the weaker one’ 7b) — is made deprived because of his sins; encoded in the phrase is the secondary meaning of ‘deprived of shields’. My translation, ‘dispossessed’, attempts to preserve this. The devil’s child is first a sinner; this makes him spiritually ‘deprived’; this, in turn, loses him the protection afforded by the ability to perceive divine truth. He might interpret 8a – another possibly deliberate linguistic pitfall – as has Mackie, to mean ‘deprived of his sins’, or, even more troublingly, as has Rodrigues, to mean ‘shriven of his sins’. One thing that can be stated with certainty is that lætan is central to the poem’s connective tissue: here is the prophet’s wisdom, the satirical element and, further, the psychomachia allegory, which Doubleday has identified as constituting ‘a major part’ of Vainglory.

Mize makes the important point that the allegory in this instance does not so much entail the battle for man’s soul as for his mind; æfþonca (26a), for instance, is formed on the root þanc, denoting thought. Mize takes the wigsteal ‘rampart’ (39a), besieged by inwitflan ‘missiles of deceit’ (37b), to refer to the mind of the devil’s child. I shall argue here that just as mind is as fortress in the poem, so too is fortress as mind. McLuhan, in his Understanding Media, claims that ‘tribal man’ sees his house as ‘a ritual extension of his body’. A similar idea is expressed, specifically relating to Anglo-Saxon feudal identity, by Tom Saunders: quoting Marx, Saunders asserts that ‘under feudalism landed property “appears as the inorganic body of its lord” ’. Hermann also considers Anglo-Saxon fortresses to be ‘material equivalents of the barricaded self’.

Vainglory is reflective of this sort of cultural idea. The allegory begins, as Huppé has pointed out, at æscstede, which foreshadows, with æsc ‘spear’, the projectile imagery that is to come. I follow Muir in my translation of lines 16b–18a in taking inne (17b) as ‘within (=in their hearts/minds)’. Free-flowing speech and free-flowing wine leave the men in the hall potentially exposed to the devil’s missiles which will debilitate their perception, causing the hall to replicate the battlefield occurring in their minds. As such, when the devil’s child is pointed out, the hall mutates into an extension of that man’s mind. The burg element of the compound, winburgum (14b), denotes a fortified town, and perhaps the hapax legomenon burgweal (38a) has been created to refer back to this, implying that what is being taken over is not just the mind of the devil’s child, but his environment.

99 Huppé, p. 10.
100 Mackie, p. 11; Rodrigues, p. 83.
102 Mize, p. 81, n. 69.
103 Mize, p. 81.
108 Muir, p. 539.
This is why, when he is assailed with projectiles, ‘one cannot tell, so to speak, whether the deadly shafts are coming in or going out’.¹⁰⁹ The devil’s child treacherously allows ‘feon-des fligepilum’ (the devil’s flying arrows [27a]) into his mind. His ability to form thoughts and perceive reality is thus fatally impaired, causing him to oblivioulsy commit offences, denoted by hinderhoca. The fortress that is an extension of the mind — the hall — then falls, through the hygegar ‘mind-dart’ (34b). The invitflan assailing the fortress/mind is the culmina-tion of this process: the man’s mind and his vision of the world are simultaneously compromised.
In this way, the projectile imagery reproduces the psychic chain of knowledge — perception — action. This is not only realized in terms of battle, but those of hospitality. Regan notes the similarity between 6b–7a — ‘godes agen bearn, l wilgest on wicum’ (‘God’s own child, a welcome guest in the places men reside’) — and 79b-81a: ‘þam bið simle | gast gegederad godes agen bearn l wilsum in worlde’ (‘that one is always accompanied by a spirit: God’s own son, delightful in the world’). Regan asserts that ‘godes agen bearn’ is first ‘the virtuous man’, than Christ, for ‘the individual’, in the tradition of the Church Fathers, ‘is identified with the one whom he imitates’.¹¹⁰ If mind is seen as home, and home as mind, then this reading can be taken further. Lines 6b-7a may mean that the speaker is able to identify a virtuous man within dwellings; they can also be taken as an ability to discern Christ within a man’s mind or Christ within dwellings. At 79b-81a, all of these meanings are extricated. Christ, if he is present in the mind, shall be present everywhere on earth.

In opposition to this, the mind of the devil’s child, the hall he inhabits, the space of heaven parallel to this, and the universe itself can be seen as ‘anti-halls’. The term ‘anti-hall’, coined by Kathryn Hume, describes ‘a symbolic correlative for various states of misery’. Anti-halls subvert the imagery of a ‘real hall’, which is a place of protection, fellowship and joy.¹¹¹ Within Vainglory, hall becomes anti-hall and world becomes dystopia, as amplifications of a diabolically infiltrated mind. The protection that all these spaces afford is removed and they are rendered ‘scyldum bescyredne’: worthless, hollow and uninhabitable. Significantly, Hume goes on to claim that, in Christian texts, ‘we find the true hall as a figuration of heaven, the anti-hall for hell’. Although hell is not depicted as an anti-hall in the poem, a polluted heaven conforms to the model. The depiction of heaven in the poem is, further, a recollection of fyrngeflit, ‘the old strife’, traditionally employed in Anglo-Saxon poetry to identify ‘present spiritual conflict within a panoramic time span.’ The broken hall, then, becomes macrocosmic.
Fyrngeflit serves to stimulate a ‘Christian warrior’s memory of past victories’, affirms ‘psychic and societal structure’, and discourages ‘destructive self-assertion’.¹¹² The description of the rebellion in heaven amplifies that of the hall: just as the devil’s child there, rejecting Christ, exalting himself and hating his better, uses that enclosure for his own ends, so do the rebellious angels wish to treacherously occupy heaven and overthrow their superior, God, ‘on hyra sylfa dom’ (‘in accordance with their own judgement’ [64b]). Line 64b also occurs in The Battle of Maldon, referring to Danish seamen who demand an amount of gold of their own choosing.¹¹³
Dom can also describe the judgment of God at the apocalypse, as in Elene: ‘ðonne dryhten sylf dom geseced’ (‘when God Himself passes judgment’).¹¹⁴ My translation attempts to preserve

¹⁰⁹ Shippey, Poems of Wisdom and Learning, p. 8.
¹¹⁰ Regan, p. 335.
¹¹³ Dobbie, The Anglo Saxon Minor Poems, p. 8 (line 38b).
the dual meanings within dom of ‘decision’ and ‘sentence’. The rebellious angels choose to act without God’s jurisdiction; in so doing, it is inevitable that they will be judged. Swice (31b, 61b) means ‘outcome’ in its first instance and ‘treachery’ in its second: through the parallelism of the perverted hall and the perverted Kingdom, the outcome of treachery is exposed.

This is a social conflict: one who exalts himself is one who places himself above his station. The devil’s child is set upon this earth and placed in the hall. He fails, however, to abide by the ‘terms and conditions’ required by both his community and by his Maker. Dynamic and assertive, the devil’s child, like the rebellious angels, attempts to disrupt the order of things, as opposed to the man who lives in peace with folk (67–72a), and passively turns the other cheek when he is wronged, deferring to the authority of Matthew 18.21–22. The speaker sees no difference between the social order of the hall and the macrocosmic order of the Christian universe. This is where the satirical element comes into play. A destructive agent in society is ‘named and shamed’ in accordance with both the Christian and Germanic-heroic idea of humor. The psychomachia allegory works in conjunction with the satirical element, identifying the devil’s child as the archetypal Anglo-Saxon and Mediterranean-Christian butt of a joke: a man who cannot perceive the truth, and will be humbled for his folly.

Conclusion

The devil’s child is not just a proud man, but a vainglorious one, for his pride is futile. The gyd’s apocalyptic resonances denote a process without time, ‘which can be said to have already been fulfilled as the consequences of the war in heaven show’.¹¹⁵ He who exalts himself has, then, already been humbled. This is an inherently paradoxical concept, one that would not appear to make sense in the mortal world of linear time. The crucial message of Vainglory is that truth is not self-evident: things are not as they seem. The poem practises what it preaches: its ellipsis puts an audience through its paces to demonstrate that words and bodies are ultimately signifiers. By holding the identity of the prophet in abeyance, the speaker strands his audience in an interpretive quagmire, and invites them to negotiate their way out using the skills that John the Baptist was born with. Vainglory might not appear particularly constructive; as Shippey remarks, it is difficult to ascertain from the poem ‘any positive, useful idea of what we are supposed to do’.¹¹⁶ In fact, this is answered in the poem’s final admonition to always keep God, our unsurpassable better, or ‘þone selestan’ in mind (82–84). In so doing, we will be afforded the ability to perceive the divine among the worldly, truth within word and Christ within man. To keep God in mind is to see his imprint on the world, and thus to see through the physical into the metaphysical. The devil’s child, ‘gode orfeormne’ (bereft of God [49b]), cannot understand that the world is really a collection of shadows on a wall, cast by a macrocosmic reality.

---

¹¹⁶ Shippey, p. 9.
Hwæt! me fæd wita on fyrdagumsægde, snotor ar, sundorwundra fæla.Wordhord onwreah\textsuperscript{117} witgan larumbeorn boca gleaw, bodan ærcwide,þæt ic sōðlice sīþan meahteongitan bi þam gæaldre godes agen bærn,wilgest on wicum, ond þone wacran\textsuperscript{118} swa some,scyldum bescyredne, on gescead witan.\textsuperscript{119}

\[\text{\textsuperscript{117}onwreah}\] MS onwearh.
\[\text{\textsuperscript{118}wacran}\] Guntner, ‘An Edition of Three Old English Poems’, p. 74, posits that this may be for \textit{wacoran} ‘the watchful one’, an epithet for Satan. Muir, \textit{The Exeter Anthology}, p. 538, suggests that ‘both meanings [of ‘weaker’ and ‘watchful’] may have been intended simultaneously’: unfortunately, a translation cannot reproduce this.

\[\text{\textsuperscript{119}witan}\] MS witon.

\[\text{\textsuperscript{120}modes gælsan}\] This verse also occurs in \textit{Juliana}, 366b.
\[\text{\textsuperscript{121}druncan}\] MS drucen.

\[\text{\textsuperscript{122}se þe hine læted...druncan to rice}\] Following Huppé’s formula (p. 11), albeit with some reshuffling for idiomatic purposes: prevents {lusts of the mind + too great a drunkenness} impairing-him. The verb \textit{amyrran} takes the accusative, and thus governs \textit{hine}.

\[\text{\textsuperscript{123}wlonce wigmipæs}\] This verse also occurs in \textit{The Battle of Brunanburh}, 72a.
\[\text{\textsuperscript{124}sōðgied wrecæð}\] This verse also occurs in \textit{The Seafarer}, 1b.
\[\text{\textsuperscript{125}dalum gedæled}\] This verse also occurs in \textit{Guthlac A}, 54a.
\[\text{\textsuperscript{126}þringeð}\] MS \textit{fringe}.

Bið þæt æfþonca eal gefylledfeondes fligelum, facensearwum.Breodað he ond bæcelð; boð hyls sylfesswiþor micle þonne se sella mon.Þenceð þæt his wise wellhwam þinceeal unforcēþ. Bīþ þæs oþer swice,þonne he þæs facnes fintan sceawæð.
Vainglory: translation

Listen! A wise and ancient witness, a clear-sighted emissary, told me of many special portents in former days. With the lore of a prophet, this religious teacher unlocked his word-hoard, the long-ago foretelling of the herald, so from then on I was truly able to perceive, by that divine utterance, God’s own child, a welcome guest in the places people reside, and similarly distinguish the weaker one, dispossessed by his sins.

Anyone might easily reflect on this, who does not let lusts of the mind in this frail existence, and too great a drunkenness in his span of days, impair him in his thoughts, when there are many speech-praisers: proud war-makers within the winehalls. They sit at feast, tell truth-tales, bandy words. They desire to know what battlefield might inwardly exist among men in the hall, when wine whets a man’s heart. The noise mounts, the uproar in the throng. They call out, each with a speech of his own. So are minds divided into types, for men are different.

One sort, in pride, pushes himself forward forcefully; an unhumbled mind swells within him: there are too many of that sort. That sort is entirely filled with the Fiend’s flying shafts of malice, with treacherous wiles. He bellows and shouts; talks himself up far more than the better one does. He thinks that his behaviour appears entirely reputable to everyone. There will be another outcome of that, when he beholds the consequence of such treacherous behaviour.
Rosemary Proctor

Wrencenb he ond blenceþ, worn geþenceþ hinderhoca, hygegar leteð, scurum sceoteþ. He þa scylde ne wat feþþe gefremede. Feþþ his betran:127 eorl fore æfståm leteð inwitflan brecaþe þone burgweal, þe him heead meotud þæt he þæt wigsteal wegan sceolde.128
Siteþ symbolwlonc, searwum leteð wine gewæged word ut faran;
þraefte þringan þrymmegebyrmed,
æfståm onæled, oferhygda ful, nipum nearowrencum.129 Nu þu cunnan meaht, gif þu þyslicne þegn gemittest wunian in wicum. Wite þe be þissum feawum forðspellum þæt þæt bip feondes bearn fæscæ bifóngen, hafað fræte lif, gunðfusne gæst gode orfeormne.130
wuldorcyninge. Þæt se wiþa song, gearowyrdig guma, ond þæt gyd awraec:
‘Se þe131 hine sylfne in þa sliþnan tid
þurh oferhygda up ahlæned, ahefeð heahmodne, se sceal hean wesan æfter neosiþum niþer gebíged, wunian witum fæst, wyrmum beþrungen.’
Þæt wæs geara iu in goðes rice þætte mid englum oferhygd astag:
widmære gewin. Wroht ahoфан, heardne heresiþ, heofon widleðan;132
forsawan hyra sellan, þa hi to swicþ þohton ond þrymcyning þeodenstoþes ricne beryfan, swa hit ryht ne wæs, ond þonne gesettan on hyra sylfra dom.133

¹²⁷ feþþ] MS feoh. Pickford has put forward a valiant argument for not emending this (pp. 15, 24). I have chosen to emend, following Mackie (p. 12), as a verb here causes the half-line to neatly parallel ‘forsawon hyra sellan’ (61a). Since there are many other parallels between the rebellion in heaven and the behavior of the devil’s child in the hall, it seems safe to assume that one is intended here.
¹²⁸ sceolde] MS sceolde.
¹²⁹ nearowrencum] Uniquely attested, but the form nearobregd exists, defined by Bosworth and Toller (p. 712) as ‘a wile or trick that brings others into straits’. Cf. Juliana (302-304a) in which a fiend in the devil’s service explains that he used nearobregdu to delude Nero into executing the disciples, Peter and Paul.
¹³⁰ gode orfeormne] Shippey (p. 57) translates, ‘worthless to God’, Huppé (p. 5), ‘without sustenance of God’. The sense, however, seems more to be that God is entirely absent in the spirit of the devil’s child: I have thus followed the earlier interpretations of Thorpe (p. 316), who reads ‘of God devoid’, and Mackie (p. 13), who has ‘destitute of God’.
¹³¹ Se þe] MS seþe.
¹³² widleðan] MS wid leðan.
¹³³ on hyra sylfra dom] This verse also occurs in The Battle of Maldon, 38b.
He plots and deceives, nurtures a great many sinister hooks, lets fly a mind-dart, hurls these in tempests. He does not know the guilt,
the enmity he has brought about. He hates his better;
the man, out of spite, lets missiles of deceit shatter that city-wall which God commended to him in order that he should defend that rampart.
He sits, ebullient with feasting; overcome with wine,
he artfully lets words go forth,
push pugnaciously, engorged with violence,
afire with spite, evils, treacherous tricks; full of pride.

Now you can recognise him,
if you meet such a man dwelling in the places people reside. Know by these few words of instruction that that one is the devil’s child, enclosed in flesh, and that he has a shameful life,
a spirit rushing to hell and bereft of God, the King of Glory.

About that sort, the prophet, a man ready with words, composed a verse, and uttered that prediction:
‘He who elevates himself through pride
in that terrible hour, exalts himself, jubilant, shall be made lowly
after the ultimate journey, and, brought down, shall live trapped in torments, encircled with serpents.’

It was long ago that, in the Kingdom of God, pride arose among the angels:
a notorious struggle. They stirred up strife,
a violent campaign; they made heaven impure;
they scorned their better when they planned treachery,
and to rob the mighty and glorious King
of his throne, as was not right,
and then to establish, in accordance with their own judgement,
Rosemary Proctor

wulðres wynlond. Þæt him wige forstod fæder frumsceafa; wearð him seo feohте to grim.
Donne bið þam œþrum ungelice,134
se þe her on eorþan eaðmod leofad, ond wiþ gesibbra gehwone simle healdeð freode on folce ond his freond lufad, þeah þe he him abýlnesse oft gefremede willum in þisse worulde.135 Se mot wulðres dream in haligra hyht heonan astigan on englæ eard.136 Ne biþ þam œþrum swa, se þe on ofermedum eargum ðædum leofad in leahtrum. Ne beoð þa lean gelic mid wuldorcyning. Wite þe be þissum, gif þu eaðmodne eorl gemete,
þegn on þeode, þam bið simle gæst gegeaderad: godes agen beam wilsum in worlde, gif me se witega ne leag.
Forþon we sculon a hyçgende hælo rædes gemunan in mode mæla gehwylcum þone selestan sigora waldend. AMEN.

134 Donne bið þam œþrum ungelice] This line also occurs in Christ III, 1262: there, however, it refers to the damned, separated from the virtuous at Judgment Day.
136 Se mot wulðres dream … on englæ eard] Editors sometimes add a preposition before wulðres dream, as prepositions precede haligra hyht and englæ eard. The addition of an ‘in’ before wulðres dream is not necessary, as Pickford (p. 28) has pointed out, since astigan can take a direct object, in its meanings of ‘board’ and ‘climb’, for instance. Yet, the fact that there are prepositions for what, according to this logic, should be other direct objects, indicates that there is a sense of progression here. 73a and 74b have, therefore, been taken as adverbial phrases: by climbing the ecstasy of glory, the humble man may enter what the holy hope for – perhaps a reference to the separation of the virtuous from the sinful at Judgment Day – and then attain the Kingdom. ‘To reach’, in the translation, is an addition for fluency’s sake. Cf. Guthlac A: the people worthy of going to heaven are ‘oferwinnað þa awyrgdæn gestas, bigytað him wulðres ræste./ hwider sceal þæs monnes mod astigan’ (those who triumph over cursed visitations, and attain for themselves a splendid repose, to where the mind of man must climb [25-26]).
a splendid land of delight. The Father of Creation denied them that with war. The fight turned out too dire for them.

But it will be different for the other one,
who lives humble-minded here on earth and, among folk, always keeps at peace with every member of his kindred, and who loves his friend, though his friend may often wilfully have done wrong
by him in this world. This one is able, from here, to climb the ecstasy of glory, into the hope of the holy,
to reach the land of the angels.

It is not so for the other one who lives in the midst of arrogant, craven deeds, in the midst of sins. Those rewards will not be alike with the King of Glory. Know by these things, if you meet a humble-minded man,
a man among the people, that one is always accompanied by a spirit: God’s own child, desirable in the world — if the prophet did not lie to me.
So, we must always, resolving upon what is needful for salvation, at all times keep that greatest Lord of Victories in mind. AMEN.