The works of 'the fourteenth-century English mystics' have too often been regarded as closed books. Despite the critical attention which they have attracted over the past few decades, very little work has yet been done on the reception, anthologisation and adaptation of these texts in the fifteenth and subsequent centuries, although the evidence available is plentiful. Even for the best known and most written about of the 'mystics', Hope Emily Allen's Writings Ascribed to Richard Rolle – in this as still in many other respects – remains to be superseded by a comprehensive modern study. In her chapter listing quotations from and references to Rolle in medieval treatises and compilations, Allen gives details of three 'compilations' and twenty-eight 'manuscripts', many of them including substantial excerpts from his works. It is a rather unproductive distinction, since many of her 'manuscripts' – a term suggesting unique and perhaps rather disparate miscellanies – are in fact different copies of the same work, and a number of these deserve to stand among the best examples of medieval compilation technique. Even if, as a consequence, the true number of distinct compilations incorporating Rolle material has been overestimated, it remains a matter for some surprise that only two of the three compilations, and barely half a dozen of the twenty-eight manuscripts, have received more than scanty further attention.

The two compilations which form the subject of the present article were both listed by Allen. One is the Latin compilation (so designated), Speculum Spiritualium, the other the English compilation (the two extant copies of which appear together in Allen's 'manuscripts' section), Disce Mori. Allen did not, however, notice that the two compilations are related. Disce Mori may in fact now be shown to be dependent on the Latin text for approximately one quarter of its content, including most of its frequently cited instruction in the contemplative life. In particular, almost all of the English compilation's borrowings from the writings of Rolle have come by way of the Speculum. Any investigation into the relationship of the two compilations must, however, be predicated on a sound knowledge of their respective texts – and this has hitherto been unavailable. This article takes as its focus a short chapter of excerpts from Rolle which the two compilations have in common, but seeks also to begin to remedy the scholarly neglect of two important witnesses to the fifteenth-century appeal of the fourteenth-century mystics.

Speculum Spiritualium, no doubt because it is a Latin compilation, has been the worse served by previous studies. Yet it was evidently popular: written between 1400 and 1430, almost certainly by a Carthusian, it survives in twelve manuscripts containing substantial portions of the text; seven more contain short excerpts; four further manuscripts are listed in the Syon brothers' catalogue, and a quotation in the Syon Myroure of oure Ladye reinforces the impression of the work's popularity at the Bridgettine house. The compilation's influence extends further to its use as a principal source for the Latin compilation Donatus Deuocionis, as well as to the borrowings in Disce Mori already mentioned. The work was also printed at Paris by Wolfgang Hopyl in two impressions of 1510, for sale in London and Paris, at the expense of a London merchant, William Bretton. The seven other texts published by Bretton in the period 1505-10 confirm the popularity of the Speculum: it was evidently expected to sell alongside such commercial certainties as Horae, Lyndwood's Provincial, psalters, graduals and the Pupilla Oculi.

Horstman described the Speculum as expounding a 'complete theory of contemplation'; in reality, it offers less a unified theory than a compendium of definitions and quotations drawn, 'with great labour and much study', from authorities both ancient and modern, on an exhaustive array of subjects, including not only the life of contemplation, but also the doctrinal knowledge and ascetic observance prerequisite for entry into that life. The compiler offers the work to those who, like himself, live an austere life, having time for contemplation – the religious – but also to those who, for lack of money, cannot have enough books: they will find in this one volume almost everything which might be necessary to them. This apparent concession to a less restricted readership is then made explicit: although the book is written principally for contemplatives, those dedicated to the active life will also find much that is of use to them.

For the reader pursuing the active life, the compiler suggests the first three of the compilation's seven parts, and the seventh. Parts One to Three deal respectively with sins, principally the seven deadly sins, and the remedies against them; temptations and tribulations, in particular those attendant upon any attempt to achieve perfection; and the sacrament of penance, and the virtues which follow from it. Part Four caters specifically for religious, with discussions of novitiate, monastic vows, and daily routine. In Part Five, the virtues of Part Three are supplemented by those que obseruanda sint ad puritatem cordis obtinendam, and which prepare the soul for contemplation. Contemplative experience itself is the subject of Part Six. Thus far, the compilation has followed the widely found pattern of an incremental progression from sin through purgation and ascesis to virtue and perfection manifested in contemplative experience. Part Seven offers another model of medieval compilation technique in covering much of the same material as the first six parts, this time in the form of an encyclopedic collection of exempla and quotations from auctores, ranged alphabetically from Abstinentia to De visitacione carnalium amicorum, before the compilation concludes with a selection of Suffragia.

The Speculum is impressively wide-ranging and up to date in its selection of auctores, and varied in its treatment of them. The technique of some of its chapters is self-evident: thus one finds a barrage of quotations deploring each of the deadly sins under the heading De Dictis sanctorum ad detestationem superbie (and so on). Elsewhere, an extended argument from the same source is allowed to develop over several chapters. Most frequently, however, a brief, apparently original introduction prepares the ground for two or three substantial excerpts (in a modern analogy, of paragraph length) from auctores. Over fifty different writers are named, and quotations from others regularly go unacknowledged. Not surprisingly, the compiler is most indebted to the great doctors - Augustine, Gregory and Bernard; but also cited are the continental contemplatives - Bridget, Suso, Elizabeth of Schönau and Mechtild of Hackeborn - and the English contemplative authors Edmund of Abingdon, Walter Hilton and Richard Rolle. Edmund is represented by two extracts from the Speculum Ecclesie, concerning true poverty and the passion; Hilton by quotations from the Latin epistles De Imagine Peccati and the Epistola de Utilitate et Prerogativis Religionis, as well as numerous excerpts from Thomas Fishlake’s translation of both books of the Scale of Perfection, including much of his most characteristic teaching on contemplation.

The extracts from Rolle, too, have much that is characteristic of him. Excerpts from the popular Emendatio Vitae total roughly half of that work, and include descriptions of the ‘three degrees of love’ and of the heights of mystical experience; devotion to the Holy Name is represented by a long passage taken from the Oleum Effusum compilation. One other quotation from Rolle is, however, exceptional, in being taken from an English work – the Form of Living – and, moreover, in being quoted (uniquely for the Speculum) in English. The chapter, which concludes Part
Two of the Speculum, consists of three passages taken from the first, fifth and sixth chapters of the Form, following the sequence of the original closely, and with no intervening material added by the compiler. In introducing the chapter, the compiler declares that he has left it in English because Rolle's doctrine sounds better in his mother tongue, as he first propounded it, than if translated into the Latin language. This might lead one to expect one of Rolle's extravagant rhetorical showpieces; the extracts selected, however, constitute an unexceptionable exhortation to discretion and moderation in ascetic practices, notably fasting and abstinence.

Speculum Spiritualium survives, as already mentioned, in a dozen manuscripts containing substantial portions of the text, and a number of others featuring extracts from the compilation. Since these have never been listed in full, and they vary considerably among themselves, it may be of use to provide a first list and classification of them here, together with some account of their relation to the printed edition by which the compilation has more usually been known.

S Salisbury: Cathedral Library, MS 56, ff. 1r-220v. 15th c. Parts I-VII. Followed by the Visio Tungdali, excerpts from Suso's Horologium Sapientie and Rolle's Emendatio Vitae. This is the only extant manuscript which appears ever to have included all seven parts of the Speculum. As it survives, it is defective at the beginning, the first complete chapter being I.xxviii. It lacks II.xv, as do all manuscripts apart from B and M, and I.xlii, which only B and the printed edition preserve. The chief departure from the printed text is, however, the arrangement of V and VI, whose chapters are reorganised into one continuously numbered sequence of fifty-three chapters, as follows:

| 1-18   | V.i-xviii |
| 19-27  | VI.i-ix   |
| 28-29  | VI.xxi-xxii |
| 30-32  | V.xix-xxi |
| 33-38  | VI.x-xx  |
| 39-42  | V.xxii-xxv |
| 43-47  | VI.xvi-xx |
| 48-53  | VI.xxiii-xxviii |

It thus numbers only six parts, to the seven of the printed text.
It appears that the Speculum was regularly divided between two, or even three, volumes. Among the copies owned by the brothers of Syon Abbey, M60 was Primum volumen speculi spiritualium continens primas 4or partes, while M61 was its companion, continens 5am 6am & 7am partes. A number of extant manuscripts testify to a similar arrangement.

Y York: Minster Library, MS XVI.I.9, ff. 1r-227v. Earlier 15th c. Parts I-IV. Ex-Mount Grace priory (Carthusian). Explicitly the first of a two volume set, its donation notice records Iste liber . . . vocatur Speculum spiritualium continens in sex partes in toto. In isto vero volumine continetur quatuor partes de eodem libro. Et in altero volumine continentur due partes videlicet quinta & sexta (f.3v). The second volume may have included only V-VI, or, if its fifth part was the intercalated V/VI witnessed by S, it may have been a complete text.

B Oxford: Bodleian Library, MS Bodley 450, ff. 17r-204v (tabula, ff. 1r-16v). 15th c. Parts I-IV. Most complete of extant manuscripts for those parts which it contains (including the rarely found I.xlii and II.xv). Closest to the printed edition. Prologue records librum in vii partes is qui compilauit diuisit (f. 17r4), indicating that the second volume followed (or was to follow) the arrangement of the printed text, rather than that of S. Prefaced by a tabula, referring only to I-IV.

R London: British Library, MS Royal 7 B xiv, ff. 1r-195v. First half of 15th c. Parts I-IV. Less unequivocally than B one of a two volume set: prologue has in vii partes, but in referring the reader dedicated to the active life to appropriate parts of the work, mentions only I-III.

L Oxford: Bodleian Library, MS Lat. Th. e. 8, ff. 1r-290v. 15th c. Parts V/VI. Ex-Priory of Saint Mary Overy, Southwark (Austin canons). The second of a three-volume set. The intercalated version of V/VI, preceded (nonsensically) by a list of chapters following the alternative arrangement found in the printed text. Followed by the first of the narrationes of VII (concerning abstinence, and including cross-references to I-III), before breaking off with: queri residuum istarum narrationum in alio libro qui sic incipit Quia vero secundum beati Gregorium &c / liber videlicet narrationum predictus speculi spiritualium (p. 266).

Other manuscripts were never designed to have complete texts. In his prologue, the compiler explicitly sanctions such selective copying, suggesting that, if a copyist – perhaps because of the prolixity of the work – does not wish to copy the whole of it, he might transcribe only those parts and chapters which seem appropriate to his (or his readers’) circumstances. Perhaps in response to this, volume M63 in the Syon catalogue contains, alongside other works of instruction, only Due prime partes speculi spiritualium. Extant manuscripts containing abridged texts testify to a variety of intended audiences and uses.

T Dublin: Trinity College, MS 271, ff. 1r-232v. Mid-15th c. Parts I-IV, plus V/VI, incomplete. Ex-Chester Abbey (Benedictine). Prologue speaks of division into only quinque partes (f. 1f). The fifth part, listed as de arte moriendi & interiori homine & de modo orandi & meditandi & aliis ad contemplacionem pertinentibus (ibid.), breaks off after the first twenty-eight chapters of the intercalated version of V/VI. All but aliis ad contemplacionem pertinentibus has been fulfilled by what survives; whether or not a full text of V/VI once followed is unclear. It is, however, evident that VII was not included.

M Oxford: Merton College, MS 204, ff. 2r-181v. Written from 1446 to 1449 by John Gisburgh, Austin canon of Merton Priory. Parts II-VI, followed by a number of short devotional texts, some in English. Entitled Speculum Humane Vite, it was intended for the use of incipiencium, proficiencium, et perfectorum (f. 2ra). Contents as the printed text, except for the transposition of VI.xii and xiii, and the omission of II.xvi (the Rolle chapter), despite its listing – in anglico extractum & scriptum de tractatu Ricardi hampoll (f. 2rb) – in the table of chapters.

G Cambridge: St. John's College, MS G.13, ff. 91v-221r. Early 15th c. Parts I-II. II.v and vi transposed; II.xv and xvi omitted. Follows a treatise on the Decalogue. Followed by an alphabetical Kalender. Some evidence of slavish copying: the prologue refers to material in in prima 2a 3a parte, and declares the work to be divided into vi partes (f. 91f) – but there is no suggestion that more than I-II was ever intended. Further, the omission of II.xvi leaves the text with the following bizarre conclusion:

> Dicto iam de [v]ariis temptacionibus & earum remediis ac de tribulacione & utlitate ipsius: subiungam quedam in lingua materna de dictis Ricardi hampoll ad discrecionem pertinencia prout superius dixi me facturum Et hoc ideo quia melius sonat eius doctrina in lingua materna prout ipse eam primo protulit:
quam si eam in linguam latinam transferam. Amen (f. 221r)

D Cambridge: University Library, MS Dd.iv.54, ff. 64r-155r. 15th c. Part II, followed by a version of Part I. Also includes texts of Rolle’s Emendatio Vitae and Expositio Super Novem Lectiones Mortuorum. II, entitled quidam tractatus de variis temptacionibus, features transposed v and vi (as G); omission of vii and xv (but not xvi), and a variant opening to xi. II.xvi is followed by Et sic finit tractatus iste, then hic incipit tractatus de temptacionibus multimodis & variis necnon & remediis contra temptationes adhibendis (f. 100v). This tractatus consists of eighteen chapters corresponding to the Speculum’s treatment of the seven deadly sins, but with substantial alteration and omission.

Ma Oxford: Magdalen College, MS 141, ff. 56r-66v. Part II, under the title Breuis compilacio de diuersis temptacionibus & earum remediis. Begun in 1433; owned, and the latter part (not including the Speculum) copied, by John Dygon, occupant of the Sheen reclusory from 1435. Other contents include Fishlake’s translation of Scale I, and the first book of Donatus Deuocionis – itself largely derived from the Speculum. As in G and D, II.v and vi are transposed; Ma shares also with D the omission of vii and xv, and the variant opening to xi; xvi is, however, omitted. The copyist, noticing the omission of vii from his exemplar, has changed the number of his seventh chapter to eight, and noted in the margin hic deficit capitulum . . . capitulum vii (f. 60v).

H London: British Library, MS Harley 237, ff. 151r-99v. 15th c. Ex-Mount Grace. Part II, supplementing a copy of the three-book version of the Cibus Anime, a compilation arguably lacking the comprehensive treatment of temptations and tribulations that II provides. Ascribed in the ownership inscription (presumably on the strength of the final chapter, with its concluding hucusque Ric. hampol) to Rolle. None of the features peculiar to G and/or DMA; xiii omitted. II.vii omitted from the preceding table of chapters, but the text of the chapter is in fact included, following on without chapter-division from vi. The table of chapters also indicates the omission of xv and the inclusion of xvi. This cannot, however, be verified since the text now ends imperfectly in xiii.

B2 Oxford: Bodleian Library, MS Bodley 549, ff. 1r-23v. Earlier 15th c. Part V/VI, incomplete. A composite manuscript, bound together in the fifteenth century. The latter part, mostly material connected with the Carthusian order, is in the hand of Stephen Dodesham, of Witham and later Sheen. It probably dates from his time at the latter house (after 1469); and, since the binding is contemporary, it seems reasonable to suppose that the earlier part of the manuscript, containing the Speculum extracts, also belonged to Sheen. Contains only V.i-xi plus xii (imperfect). A preceding table of chapters, however, lists thirty-two chapters, corresponding with the first thirty-two of the fifty-three chapters of the intercalated version of V/VI. This evidence for an abbreviated V/VI could be of relevance to the surviving text in T, whose twenty-eight chapters plus the heading for a twenty-ninth might thus represent, not barely half of the full V/VI, but a near-complete copy of the version of the text attested by B².³²

The Syon brothers possessed, in the first volume of a two-volume copy of the Speculum, a Tabula vocalis super integrum opus.³³ Other manuscripts – B and G – as well as the printed edition, contain tabulae or kalenders, in addition to the detailed lists of chapters found in nearly all manuscripts. In addition, Part VII of the compilation itself functions much like a tabula, in that its alphabetical collection of narrationes includes also cross-references to the rest of the work. Speculum Spiritualium was thus well equipped for use as a florilegium, both in the compilation of other treatises, such as Disce Mori and Donatus Deuocionis, and for briefer quotations in commonplace books and manuscript miscellanies. No doubt the instances recorded below represent only a small proportion of the extant (and a still smaller proportion of the one-time) total.

T² Dublin: Trinity College, MS 277, p. 549. Mid-15th c. Probably from York. Two exempla from VII. A note following the extracts acknowledges their source, and identifies it as a six-part text of the Speculum: *Iste due narraciones predicte habentur in libro uocato speculum spiritualium parte sexta titulo prelatis in littera P.*³⁴

T³ Dublin: Trinity College, MS 432, section F of a composite manuscript, ff. 143⁵⁻¹⁴⁴⁷. 15th c. A quotation ascribed to Bonaunetura . . . in sexta parte libri spiritualium is part of VI.xxv (and is actually taken from chapter xii of Rolle’s Emendatio Vitae).³⁵

Do Bath: Downside Abbey, MS 26542, ff. 168⁵⁻⁷²⁷. Later 15th c. Presented to Betryce Chaumbre on the occasion of her reception into the Dominican priory of Dartford, and to be retained there in perpetuity for the use of the nuns. Includes V.xxi, a commendation of meditation on the passion drawing on Suso and Mechtild of Hackeborn.³⁶
A Chapter from Richard Rolle in Two Fifteenth-Century Compilations

F Cambridge: University Library, MS Ff.vi.33, ff. 26\textsuperscript{v}-31\textsuperscript{v}. Written by William Darker of Sheen (fl. c. 1500) for the nuns of Syon. Features the sole surviving copy of the sisters' Additions to the Bridgettine Rule. Includes III.xxvii (commentary on the Pater Noster), in a unique translation into English.\textsuperscript{37}

Three further manuscripts attest the separate circulation of II.xiii, an account of the temptations faced by the elect based on the third of Peter of Blois's twelve 'profits of tribulation'.\textsuperscript{38} In this case, however, it is less clear whether the text is to be considered an excerpt from the Speculum, or one of its sources.

Jo Oxford: St. John's College, MS 77, ff. 13\textsuperscript{v}-16\textsuperscript{v}. 15th c. Given by John Dygon of the Sheen reclusory (owner also of Ma) to Exeter College, Oxford.\textsuperscript{39}

K Cambridge: University Library, MS Kk.vi.41, ff. 113\textsuperscript{v}-124\textsuperscript{v}. 15th c. Text closely related to Jo, with which it regularly agrees against the printed edition.\textsuperscript{40}

E Cambridge: St. John's College, MS E.22. Written at Hinton charterhouse by John Clerk (d. 1472). Chapter 13 of an 18-chapter compilation entitled Veni mecum in adiutorium. Its text omits the usual final sentence, and proceeds to a lengthy addition on the need to fear the occasion of sin, and its consequences. Regularly agrees with Jo and K against the printed edition, but not with the same degree of agreement as between Jo and K. Also includes, as chapter 16, a version of III.xxii (an extract from the Stimulus Amoris), here ascribed to Bartholomeus in libro qui vocatur Florarium de vita perfecte.\textsuperscript{41}

Ten manuscripts thus contain Part Two of Speculum Spiritualium in substantially complete form, making it the most frequently attested part of the compilation. Of these ten manuscripts, six, BDRSTY, include II.xvi, the English chapter from Rolle's Form of Living; it has been lost from one, H, and omitted from three others, GMMa. An analysis of the variants for this chapter might be expected to provide further evidence for the grouping of the extant manuscripts of the compilation. In the event, the readings of most manuscripts emerge as idiosyncratic. Against this, two pairings stand out clearly. Twelve readings found in R and S are unique to these two manuscripts.\textsuperscript{42} Independent readings in each, however, suggest neither is copied from the other; moreover, while S has a six-part text, featuring intercalated Parts V-VI, R seems to have followed the seven-part arrangement of the printed edition. More revealing are the four cases of agreement of B with the text of the printed edition (hereafter, and in the transcription below, π) against all other manuscripts, twice in clear error, and the two instances of alterations to B incorporated into π, but no other manuscript.\textsuperscript{43} This would suggest that the printed text was set up from B or a manuscript of its type. That B itself was not the compositor's copy is suggested by the spelling \textit{wip} or \textit{wiy} for 'with' in π against the \textit{whit} of B; although such variation would normally be explained by a compositor's (or a scribe's) alteration to his own idiolect, the fact that the compositor of π was so clearly unfamiliar with the English language in this instance makes his evidence all the more reliable.\textsuperscript{44} The printed text was, then, set up from a manuscript related to B. That this manuscript was a descendent rather than an antecedent of B is suggested by the reading \textit{Ther pe while} for \textit{Therfor pe while}, which B shares with π, where the omission of \textit{for} coincides with, and may reasonably be explained by, the break in B between one column of the page and the next.\textsuperscript{45}

The relationship between B and the printed edition may be demonstrated from other evidence. Part Two is the most volatile part of the \textit{Speculum} in terms of inclusion and omission of chapters: only B among the extant manuscripts has all the sixteen found in the printed text. (Similarly, only B and the printed text preserve I.xlii.) Moreover, while all manuscripts except G omit II.vii from their tables of chapters to Part Two, only B and the 1510 printing also fail to list II.xiii. Perhaps the most striking evidence for the dependence of the printed edition on a manuscript related to B is, however, afforded by a comparison of the \textit{tabulae} which preface the text in each, and the apparatus which accompany them. In B, the \textit{Tabula}, in a different hand from the main text had, has been added on two quires bound into the front of the manuscript.\textsuperscript{46} It lists alphabetically a range of key topics which are treated in the compilation, from \textit{Abusio} to \textit{Zelator}, referring the reader to the appropriate part and chapter of the compilation. Subdivision of chapters is indicated in the \textit{Tabula} by a letter of the alphabet, which corresponds with marginal letters located at convenient intervals throughout the text, and recommencing at 'A' with the start of each new chapter. Since references are to the first four parts of the compilation only, it may be inferred that this is not the \textit{Tabula vocalis super integrum opus} mentioned in the Syon catalogue. Nevertheless, it is this \textit{Tabula} which is adopted for the printed edition, in spite of the fact that the latter includes all seven parts of the compilation. The only difference between the printed \textit{Tabula} and that in B is the omission from the former of the references to marginal letters. These are still in evidence in the text, at the same points in the argument, but their recommencement at 'A' with the first division of each recto, rather than of each chapter, has rendered them useless as a means of access to the text.\textsuperscript{47}
A Tabula of this kind would, as noted above, have greatly facilitated the production of such derivatives of the Speculum as Donatus Deuocionis and Disce Mori. The latter is a lengthy English compilation, whose composition is to be dated between 1453 and 1464, extant in two manuscripts – Oxford: Jesus College, MS 39, and Bodleian Library, MS Laud misc. 99 – the first belonging to (but not necessarily originating from) Syon Abbey. Approximately the first four-fifths of the work follow the usual syllabus of catechetic instruction characteristic of the manual of religious instruction, and are derived in chief from the French Miroir du monde, with a section on temptations and tribulations taken from the English Chastising of God's Children. The text concludes with an 'Exhortacion' to the contemplative life, to which its female dedicatee has bound herself. This 'Exhortacion' is notable in particular for its regular use of the English contemplative authors, Rolle and Hilton (although both are found, albeit with less frequency, in the earlier parts of the compilation), and its assured handling of a wide-ranging discussion whose argument does not benefit from the extrinsic unity imparted by participation in the manual tradition.

Many of the parts of the compilation for which a source had not hitherto been identified – the remedies against the seven deadly sins; sins of heart, mouth, deed, omission and against the Holy Spirit; blasphemy; penance, and much of the concluding 'Exhortacion' – are in fact derived from the Speculum. Almost all the work's borrowings from the 'English mystics' can be accounted for in this way. The Speculum's chapter from Rolle is unique in that it is borrowed twice. Its first occurrence is as part of the discussion of fasting as an element of satisfaction for sin; it appears again in the 'litel fourme hou ye shal lyue' which opens the 'Exhortacion', in the context of other warnings against excessive asceticism. The two versions of the chapter are strikingly different. The first is characterised by extensive paraphrase, while the second follows its original closely. Thus, corresponding to lines 32-34 in the transcription below, the second version of the chapter reads

\[... \text{and holde hem fro moche spekyng of men, and take paciently what God sent for the tyme and place, and yeue hem hooly and parfitly to pe loue and pe worship of oure Lorde, Ihesu Crist}\]

with 'place' for 'stede', and some freedom in the treatment of the definite article; while the earlier version expands to

\[... \text{and eschewe pe vayne speche of men for peire fastyng, and with pankyngges to God take such as God wol sende hem for pe}\] place & pe tyme, and entende rather to pe parfit desire and brennyng loue of oure Lorde.\textsuperscript{51}

Similarly, where the later chapter follows the \textit{Speculum} in 'I wolbe pat pou be euermore clymbyng vpward to Ihesu', the same phrase in the first version becomes:

\begin{quote}
I wolbe perfore pat pou begynne faire and softe, and goo not bakward. For as pe gospel seith, 'He pat setteth his hande to pe plough and loketh bakward is not apt to pe kyngdome of God.' Take no suche perfeccion vpon pe as pi discrecion wol telle pee pat pou maist not parfourme. Be not singuler, but euere desire to clyme vpward in loue to Ihesu . . .\textsuperscript{52}
\end{quote}

Since the second of these two versions of the Rolle chapter remains so close to its source, it might be expected to yield some clues as to the textual affiliations of the manuscript of the \textit{Speculum} used by the compiler of \textit{Disce Mori}. In the event, all the evidence is negative: its text shares none of the errors of BT\textit{I}, nor the readings common to \textit{R} and S. The text with which there is the least disagreement is \textit{Y} – but a positive identification would be unwise, given the minor nature of most of the variants involved, and the fact that a number of manuscripts of the \textit{Speculum} – including all those which were once at Syon – have been lost. What is apparent, however, is a markedly different approach to the source in the two versions of the chapter.\textsuperscript{53}

Indeed, one is tempted on the strength of this contrast to speculate as to whether the 'Exhortacion' was a later addition to some pre-existing (and fairly conventional) manual of religious instruction, written for the specific purpose of converting it into a guide to the contemplative life. Its opening certainly has the air of a new departure, even separate composition –

\begin{quote}
Suster, now ye haue herde pe comendacion of pis vertu chastite, pe whiche ye haue chosen to clope you yn, and avowed it to youre spouse Ihesu Crist, I wil write you in pende of pis booke, whiche treteth of vices and vertues, as ye haue red afore, a litel fourme hou ye shal lyue to pe plesance of youre seid spouse and, with his grace and helpe, so ende your lyf in his seruice pat ye may come to his blisse pat he bought you to –
\end{quote}
and such an act of appropriation and adaptation would not be without precedent in the field of late medieval devotional texts.\textsuperscript{54}

It is a measure of the density of Hope Emily Allen's great compendium on Rolle that much of the information it contains is only now being assimilated and supplemented by modern research. Too often it has been forgotten that the works of the 'fourteenth-century English mystics' did not attain the status of literary and historical monuments with the turn of the fifteenth century, but were fair game for the compilers and anthologisers who seem to have been that century's most active literary producers. The reception of these authors by their immediate literary descendants is not without significance. Certainly the chapter from Rolle discussed here impressed the compiler of \textit{Disce Mori} enough for it to be included twice in his compilation; and it is instructive to see not only a doctrinal but also an aesthetic welcome being extended to the vernacular writers on contemplation in the \textit{Speculum} compiler's decision to allow Rolle's work to stand \textit{in lingua materna prout ipse eam primo protulit}.\textsuperscript{55}
APPENDIX: SPECULUM SPIRITUALIUM II.xvi

Transcribed from MS Bodley 450, ff. 205rb-206rb

The decision of the Speculum's compiler not to translate the extracts from Rolle's Form of Living into Latin appears to have posed considerable difficulties for the compositor of the printed edition, working in Wolfgang Hopyl's Paris workshop. He seems to have been mystified by ƿ, which appears most often as ƿ, but as a variety of other letters also; w, similarly, is generally rendered vv, but sometimes completely misread, as when how becomes hors. Word-division is often indeterminate, on occasion plainly wrong – as doine for do. I ne. Lack of familiarity with English is further demonstrated by such errors as wy ont for wip out, zeldevo for zelde vp and nouede yonf for no nede þerof.\textsuperscript{56} The transcription of the chapter given below is, accordingly, taken not from the printed edition, but from the manuscript closest to it, Oxford: Bodleian Library, MS Bodley 450.

Comparison of the text of the chapter with the text and variants given in the edition of the Form by S. J. Ogilvie-Thomson reveals a considerable amount of minor variation, four omissions of whole lines, and a number of more significant variants. Two of the omissions are unique; the other two are, in combination, unrevealing, since one is supported by the manuscript grouping headed by Cambridge: University Library, MS Dd.v.64 (base text for Allen's edition), the other by the group closest to Longleat, MS 29 (chosen by Ogilvie-Thomson).\textsuperscript{57} In general, however, the Speculum chapter agrees with the former (Dd) group against the latter. In particular, a high level of agreement is found with the Dd sub-group PFLdHT\textsuperscript{2}B\textsuperscript{2}: among seventeen variants for which there is corroboration from the Dd group, all but two are supported by at least one member of PFLdHT\textsuperscript{2}B\textsuperscript{2} – and these exceptions are different instances of the same easily made substitution, faille for faille.\textsuperscript{58} In fourteen of these fifteen cases, the corroborating manuscripts include F, the Foyle MS. In addition, four additions made in the Speculum are elsewhere found only in F.\textsuperscript{59} If, however, as seems certain, F is not to be dated before 1465, it clearly cannot have been used by the compiler of the Speculum.\textsuperscript{60} A further variant would appear to confirm this. The northern form quathis in and oft shal þou be in quathis appears to have caused problems for a number of copyists: several translate to feyntnes or feyntise; one omits it altogether. F has þouȝtis, which cannot be derived from quathis by a simple scribal error, and, equally, does not seem likely to give rise to the Speculum's and oft schalt þu be coghyngne. Probably both are derived from an intermediate reading along the lines of the in cowȝis found in two manuscripts.\textsuperscript{61} The compiler of the Speculum thus used a manuscript antecedent to F, but closer to it than to any of the other extant manuscripts.

The text which follows is transcribed from MS Bodley 450; variants from other manuscripts and the printed text are given following the text. Division into paragraphs is according to the extent of continuous borrowings from Rolle's text, and is for ease of reference; corresponding line numbers in Ogilvie-Thomson's edition of the Form are given preceding each paragraph. Abbreviations are expanded and underlined; insertions are indicated thus: '...'; words cancelled but still legible in the manuscript are enclosed in angle brackets, words supplied from another manuscript in square brackets.
Sequitur hic vnum capitulum de discrecione habenda non solum in cibo & potu. sed eciam in somnpo & est extractum de tractatu quem transmisit cuidam recluse <prefatus> Ricardi hampol

Svmmen <men> as Richarde hampol saiþ ben begylet whit ouermuche abstinence of mete & drynke and of slepe. and þat is of temptacio[n] of þe deuel. for to make hem falle at here myd werke. so þat þay (205va) bryng þe to no goode ende as þay schulde done; 3if þay knewe resoun and helde discreciou[n]. And so þay lese here merite for here frowardenes. þese greues leyth oure enmy; to taken vs with when we begynne to hate wikkednes and turne to god. þan many a man begynneth þat þyng þat he may neuer bryng to good ende. þan þay wenep þat þay may dòo what so ouer here herte is sette on. but ofte þay fallen or þay comen to myd wey. and þat þyng þat þay wene were for hem is leTTYng to hem. for we haue a longe way to heuen. and as mony good dedes as we done. as mony prayers as we make. and as mony good poughtes as we þenke in feyth hope and charite; also mony passes goo we to heuen warde. Then 3if we make vs so feble þat we may ne’i’per worche as we schulden done; ne pray as we schulden pray; ne þenke as we schulden þenke. be we not gretly to blame þat fallen when we hadde moste niede to be stalworth? wel I wot þat it is not goddes wille þat we do so. For þe prophete seyth. lorde I schal kepe my strengpe to þe; so þat I may susteyne goddes seruice to my dep day. noght in a litel ne in a schorte tyme waste my myght; and afterwarde lyen weylynge and gronyng by þe walle; for it is muche more (205vb) perel þan men wene. For seint <seint> Jerome seyþ þat he makeþ of raueyne offrynge; þat by outrage goueryng turmenteþ his body in ouer litel mete or drynke or slepe. Also seint Bernarde seip fastynge and wakyng letteþ not goostly goodes. but helpeþ. if it be done by discrecio[n]. and whit oute discreciou[n]; þay ben vices. þerfore it is noght goode ’to pyne’ vs so muche. And afterwarde haue mawgre for oure dede. þer han be mony and beþ þat wenen þat it is noght þat þay pay done; but þay ben in so muche abstinence and fastynge; þat þay make alle men to speke of hem þat knowen hem. But of suche it falleþ þat euer þe more ioy and wondryng þat þay han whit out of þe worshipynge of men; þe lasse ioy þay haue whit inne of þe loue of god. To my dome þay schulde pay ihesu criste more 3if þay toke for his loue and in þat þankynge and worshipynge of hym suche as þay myght susteyne here bodyes whit to his seruice and holde hem fro much spekyng of.
men and [take] paciently what god sent. for þe tyme and þe stede. and 3eue hem holich and perfitelich to þe loue and worshipe of oure lord ihesu criste; þat wole stalworthy and lastingly be serued. so þat here holynes were more seyn in goddes eye; þan in mannes eye. for euery þe better þat þu arte (206rd) and þe lasse speche hast of men; þe more is þe ioy before god.

I wole þat þu be euerymore clymbyng vpwarde to ihesu and echyng þy loue and þy seruice in hym. and noght as foles done; for þay begynne in þe heyest dege; and comen doun in to þe lowest. For mony þat were breynynge at þe begynninge and able to þe loue of ihesu criste; þurgh mucche penaunce þay han letten hem selfe and made hem so feble; þat þay mowe not loue god as þay schulde do. I ne halde þe neuer þe lasse of merite; þey þu be not in so muche abstinance as þu hast ybe but þat þu sette alle þy pouȝtes how þu myghtest love þy spouse ihesu criste; more þan þu haste done

(440-55)

I say forsobe ȝif þu take sustinaunce of suche godes as god sendeþ whit discrecioun and temperaunce þu doste wel. Neuerpeles ȝif þu leue mony metes þat men vsen not dispisyng þat mete þat god hap made to mannes helpe. but for þe þynkeþ þat þu <ne> haste `no` nede þer of; þu doste wel; ȝif þu see þat þu arte stalworþe ynow; for to serue god and it brekiþ not þy stomake; `For ȝif þu haue broke þi stomake;` whit ouermuche abstinance; þe is bereveth appetite of mete; and ofte schalt þu be coghynges as þu were redy to selde vp þe goste. and wete þu wel þu synneste in þat dede and þu maiste not sone wete; weþer þy abstinance be whit þe or aȝens þe. Ther(206<sup>rb</sup>)þe while þat þu arte ȝonge; I rede þat þu ete and drynke beter and wers as it comeþ; þat þu be not begyled and afterwarde when þu haste proued mony þynges and ouercome mony temptaciouns; and knoweste þy selfe and god better þan þu doste now; þan ȝif þu see þat it be to do; þu may take to þe more abstinance. hucusque Ricardus hampol.

NOTES

1 This article is based on material from the third chapter of my D. Phil. thesis, 'A Critical Edition of the Concluding Part of Disce Mori, a late medieval devotional compilation, with a study of some related texts' (2 vols., Oxford, 1994). It is no accident that its title is a form of omaggio a Professor Anne Hudson, whose 'A Chapter from Walter Hilton in Two Middle English Compilations', Neophilologus 52 (1968), 416-21, remains the most important article on Disce Mori, and who was the supervisor of my thesis. I am grateful also for her helpful comments on an earlier version of the present article. I have benefitted further from many productive suggestions from the Leeds Studies in English readers.

Nicholas Watson, despite a comprehensive revision of much of what Allen has to say about the chronology of Rolle's writings, and the qualities of his Latin works, does not introduce the subject of anthologisation and compilation before his 'Epilogue'. The terminus a quo for composition is given by the borrowings from Fishlake's translation of the Scale of Perfection, completed c. 1400; the terminus ante quern by the use of the Speculum in the compilation of Donatus Deuocionis, which (at least in two manuscripts) is dated 1430 [Doyle, 'European Circulation', p. 138]. The Syon catalogue, in its index, ascribes the Speculum to both Adam monachus cartusiensis and Henricus cartusiensis [M. Bateson, ed., Catalogue of the Library of Syon Monastery (Cambridge, 1898)]; the catalogue entry for M60 seems to indicate (although the syntax is not unambiguous) that the latter is in fact the compiler only of the rubrics to the text: Primum volumen speculi spiritualium . . . cum suis Rubricis vnicuique parti premisssis ex compilacione dompni henrici Domus Cartusiensis de Bethleem monachi [Bateson, Catalogue, p. 107]. Nevertheless, manuscript D (below) includes a note to the effect that hic est liber secundus speculi spiritualium henrici de balnea cartusiensis [f. 64r and cf. 100v]. Syon manuscripts of the Speculum are M60-1 (a two-volume set), M62, M63, M108; in addition, M36 is a copy of the 1510 printed edition. 14 Extracts from chapters iv, v, vii, viii, xi and xii of Emendatio Vitae are found in I.xli, II.xiii, III.xvi, IV.xxxi, V.xvii, VI.i, vi, xx and xxii; the passage from Oleum Effusum is part of V.xviii.

15 This chapter of the Speculum is noticed by Allen, Writings, pp. 263, 406.

16 Quia melius sonat eius doctrina in lingua materna prout ipse earn primo protulit quam si eam in linguam transferrem latinam [f. xlix vb]. This is the concluding sentence of II.xv.

17 Bloomfield, Incipits, no. 5934, lists only six manuscripts; a further four are mentioned in Moyes, Expositio, I.22 and II.50-52. I am grateful to Dr. A. I. Doyle for information concerning other manuscripts of the Speculum.

18 For S, see S. M. Lakin, A Catalogue of the Library of the Cathedral Church of Salisbury (London, 1880), p. 13. Dates given for the manuscripts in the following list are generally those given in the catalogue of the relevant library. Doubtless further research will in many cases be able to fix these more precisely.

21 B is no. 2398 in the Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library at Oxford which have not hitherto been catalogued in the Quarto series, ed. F. Madan, 7 vols. (Oxford, 1895-1937). For the relation to the printed text, see below. The Summary Catalogue assigns the book to Reading; it was however rejected by Ker (Medieval Libraries, p. 158). I am grateful to Dr. Alan Coates for confirming (and explaining the grounds for) this rejection of a Reading connection to me.

22 For R, see G. F. Warner and J. P. Gilson, Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Old Royal and King's Collections, 4 vols. (London, 1921), i.173-74. For the prologue, see f. i\(^a\).

23 Summary Catalogue, no. 32566. The variant version of V-VI is described in a note inserted into the Bodleian copy of the catalogue, facing p. 171. For provenance, see Ker, Medieval Libraries, p. 181.

24 Si cui autem non libet totum librum sibi conscribere quia fortassis nimiris prolixus sibi videbitur transcribat saltem ea capitula vel partes que sibi & sui status personis viderit conuenire [f. i\(^a\)].

28 For G, see M. R. James, A Descriptive Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Library of St. John's College, Cambridge (Cambridge, 1913), no.181 (pp. 213-14). In the quotation, the \(v\) of \(variae\) is unclear and has been supplied from the printed edition. James's suggestion of a Bury provenance is rejected by Ker, Medieval Libraries, p. 22.

30 For Ma, see Coxe, Catalogus, II.(2).67; Watson, Dated and Datable Manuscripts, no.830 (i.138). Moyes, Expositio, II.52 and n. 60 notes the correspondence with D; I can find no trace of D's version of I which he also declares to be present.

33 Bateson, Catalogue, M60 (p. 107).

34 For T\(^2\), see Colker, Catalogue, 509-32: this excerpt is at p. 530. Moyes (Expositio, II.109-10) argues convincingly against Allen's characterisation of this as a Lollard manuscript.

47 Interestingly, the Pupilla Oculi produced by Hopyl at the instigation of Bretton in the same year as the Speculum (STC 4115) has had a Tabula added to it (cf. f. iv) employing the same system of marginal letters. Here, however, the letters in the text begin, correctly, with the first division of each chapter.

49 I hope to return to the question of the use of 'mystical' authors in Disce Mori at a later date.

55 Speculum, f. xlix. To say 'the compiler of Disce Mori' included the chapter twice is not necessarily a contradiction of the possibility raised above; the incongruity of the repetition would have been equally evident to a reviser/supplementer as to the original author (if, indeed, they were not the same person).
