Article:

Christopher A. Jones, 'The Irregular Life in Ælfric Bata's Colloquies', Leeds Studies in English, n.s. 37 (2006), 241-60

Permanent URL:
https://ludos.leeds.ac.uk:443/R/-?func=dbin-jump-full&object_id=123825&siro_library=GEN01
The Irregular Life in Ælfric Bata's Colloquies

Christopher A. Jones

Our scant knowledge of life inside Anglo-Saxon monasteries makes the Colloquies of Ælfric Bata (fl. s. xi) at once important and frustrating. The chatty, tipsy monks who populate these dialogues may have enlivened Latin conversation-drills for Anglo-Saxon oblates. Today, however, determining where the jokes end and trustworthy details begin is embarrassingly hard. If Bata's context was the 'reformed monasticism' of Benedict's Rule as codified in the emergent genre of customaries, then either the jokes of the Colloquies went far indeed – much farther than often acknowledged – or the prescriptive sources themselves are hopelessly misleading. To review these severe alternatives and ponder a course between them seem appropriate goals for an essay honouring Joyce Hill, author of inspiring articles about colloquies and monastic custom.

For all the celebrity of reformed monasticism in Anglo-Saxon England, its internal organization is poorly documented. Like other pre-eleventh-century customaries, the Regularis concordia drafted c. 973 by Æthelwold of Winchester deals mainly with liturgy and may reflect ideals more than actualities. Its goal has been compared to Carolingian aspirations for 'one rule, one custom', though evidence for promulgation of the Concordia is slight. Both surviving copies come from one place (Christ Church, Canterbury) two generations after Æthelwold, and probably neither manuscript served as the text of reference for any house. Others who knew the work treated it as a source to mine: Ælfric of Eynsham, Æthelwold's student, adapted the Concordia freely, as did a Winchester translator whose Old English version accommodated a house of nuns. It pays to recall, moreover, that reformed monasteries were always far fewer than unreformed minsters or other types of foundation, and that boundaries between monastic and secular clergy remained permeable.
Christopher A. Jones

The disputable impact of the Concordia and ambiguity of its manuscript tradition are problems familiar to historians of monastic custom, who have long debated the evidentiary value of written consuetudines. Typologies of 'descriptive' versus 'prescriptive' have increasingly yielded to approaches more flexible and less eager to infer reformist alliances from sample Punktvergleiche of customs or from the mere presence of one house's customary at another. These lessons bear on the reception of the Concordia and equally on its indebtedness to continental sources. Æthelwold's proem acknowledges influences from Ghent and Fleury specifically, and modern research has regarded the Concordia as, variously, Lotharingian, Fleuriac, or distantly Cluniac. The discovery of Thierry of Amorbach's customary describing uses at Fleury c. 1000 has recently affirmed Æthelwold's debts to that house, but much about the continental affiliations of Anglo-Saxon customs remains unclear.

The 'Bata problem' therefore involves not only patent misbehaviours shown in the Colloquies but our own uncertainty about actual (as opposed to ideal) English standards of 'monastic' and 'reformed' at the time. To contextualize Bata's witness, I begin with a survey of moments in the Colloquies that appear to defy trends of tenth- and eleventh-century regulation, whether English or continental. Thereafter I consider how representations of 'irregularity' were used by other monastic authors in the period, and how these analogues may render Bata somewhat less puzzling.

The Colloquies and reformed customs

In England, as on the Continent, 'reform' was a protean concept. But to emphasize only its variety does injustice to the impressive continuities dating back, in important respects, to Benedict of Aniane. Two such areas of wide consensus happen to be ones where the Colloquies frequently transgress, namely the observance of silence and the nurture of oblates. The value attached to silence is easily forgotten, but in reformed circles 'by the tenth century there was scarcely a time or a place for monks to speak'. The trend registers directly in Anglo-Saxon customaries and indirectly in the Old English monastic sign-language list Monasteriales [sic] indicia. Some allowances for speech must have been made in the 'school' but need not have gone so far as free conversation. Ælfric of Eynsham's Colloquy is instructive in this regard: the framing remarks of its magister represent that entire exchange as a controlled give-and-take within the scola. Though several of Bata's pieces suggest a comparable setting (e.g., Colloquies 3-6 and probably 14-18), others blithely portray talk during the horae incompetentes of night (e.g., Colloquies 1-2 and 10-12) and while eating or drinking in the refectory (Colloquies 8-9 and 24).

Yet the more serious irregularities dramatized by Bata concern the supervision of younger scolastici. These are presumably oblates – boys offered to the monastery by their parents and immersed in a system of intellectual and spiritual formation. The categories and terminology for 'boys' versus 'youths' or 'adolescents' were not entirely stable. In theory the scola included pueri aged seven to fifteen; thereafter as iunenes they might join the regular community but remain under close watch for several more years. A balance of punishment (disciplina) and constant policing (custodia) was supposed to transform oblates into elite monk-priests whose purity guaranteed the efficacy of a community's prayers and, hence, its ability to attract patronage. The fact that an entire institutional identity was at stake in keeping the oblates pure explains why customaries and related sources, especially the ninth-century Rule-commentary by Hildemar of Corbie, recommend that persons sub custodia never be left by themselves or alone in the private company of anyone else. Other than magistri, only a few high-ranking monks were allowed to address or even gesture to the pueri. Children themselves internalized these and other measures from an early age, learning (for example) to sit at a prescribed distance from one another, curbing impulses to touch or speak and keeping their bodies always covered.

It comes as no surprise that some late-Anglo-Saxon sources reflect these trends: the proem to the Concordia forbids senior monks, including abbots, to embrace the pueri and iunenes: 'Nec ad obsequium priuatum quempiam illorum [scil. puerorum uel adolescementum] nec saltem sub spiritualis rei obtentu solum deducere praesumant [scil. seniores], sed uti regula praecipit sub sui custodis vigilantia iugiter maneant. Nec ipse custos cum singulo aliquo puerulo sine tertio qui testis assistat migrandi licentiam habeat.' Æthelwold here bows to the most rigorous continental observance, possibly to Fleury in particular, though the impact of the Concordia here as elsewhere can only be guessed. The oblate in Ælfric of Eynsham's Colloquy calls himself a 'puer sub virga', suggesting that conventions of custodia are familiar enough for the periphrasis to need no further explanation. More than a half-century later, Osbern of Canterbury links the memory of Dunstan to the same emblem: when, for fear of their abusive magistri, oblates at Christ Church seek refuge at his tomb, the sainted archbishop appears holding not a bishop's staff but a master's virga.
The Colloquies’ disregard of custody is extreme. Whatever relief Æthelwold might have felt when Bata has one boy say 'non audeo osculari te, frater' to an overly affectionate elder, little else would have pleased. The boys of the scola are left unsupervised at least twice, first while their master strolls in the cemetery to chat with a layman, then again as oblates go to and from the refectory. Individual boys head off on errands without custodes. One monk upon rising sends a lone youngster out in the dead of night to fetch water; another boy is left behind by his master and peers to sleep through Nocturns. Bata even has boys called upon to assist others with their cura corporis. Most irregular is a repeated request in Bata's Colloquies 9 and 10 that a lone boy accompany an elder to the latrine. In the first instance the boy answers that he must ask his master's permission. The master, instead of refusing or demanding (as at Cluny or Fleury) that an additional witness accompany the pair, enthusiastically encourages the boy to guide the monk to the latrine, then to bed, and there help him remove his shoes.

In the latter detail, neglect of custody extends even to the sleeping quarters, a zone of particular anxiety in monastic regulation. Chapter 22 of Benedict's Rule had required that the beds of youths (adolescentiores) be arranged among those of their elders for easier supervision; Hildemar names outright the targets of vigilance as homosexual contact (sodomiticum scelus) and masturbation (immunditium). By the eleventh century, some reformers had come to see the dangers as arising less among the oblates than from older monks preying on them. The realization led to revised sleeping arrangements, described most revealingly at Fleury by Bata's contemporary, Thierry: 'lectuli infantum nequaquam fratrum lectis intermiscetur, sed potius in medio dormitorii fiunt ubi lucerne pendent, ut ex omni parte circumspici possunt. Lubricum quippe est valde et periculosum inter spiritales viros conversari pueros, quia nonnumquam scandalum permaximum atque destructio locorum inde procedit'. A similar arrangement pertains in Cluniac and other sources, corroborating the reformers' particular worries about the dormitory. Bata describes nothing overtly scandalous as his speakers retire to bed in Colloquies 9-11. But the boys' duty in making up elders' beds (Colloquies 9-10) is hard to square with typical arrangements that those under custody entered and exited the dormitory silently, as a group, having no reason or permission to touch the beds of older monks. Other of Bata's remarks about the dormitory are also surprising, as in Colloquy 12 where the chief sacristan responsible for waking the whole community must himself be woken by an errand-boy.
The cura corporis occasions some of Bata's other major challenges to reformist custody. His Colloquy 23 seems realistic on the preparation and infrequency of baths, and in the detail that bathing rotations were not interrupted even for liturgical duties. On the other hand, Bata's description of an adolescens helping one monk to get undressed, bathe, then get dressed again defies the letter and spirit of most prescription. In principle, bathing was possibly the only time when a monk was entirely naked and allowed to touch his unclothed body. For magistri charged with upholding custody even here, the conflicting demands of supervision and modesty must have been as tricky as during latrine-visits. The washing of faces and hands at intervals throughout each day involved fewer pitfalls, but oblates remained segregated and scrutinized at these moments too. Though Bata describes younger monks' participation in mutual shaving or hair-trimming, customaries tend to forbid those under custody to perform these tasks for one another (although they might, if supervised, so tend their custodes).

Like his depiction of bathing, Bata's remarks about clothes are also, when held up to reformist sources, a mix of the credible and incredible. In Colloquy 26 a boy complains of neglect by the officer who distributes clothes (Bata's vestiarius, typically the camerarius in other sources); given the value that reformed communities placed on their oblates, the charge has a whiff of the implausible about it. But Bata's inventory of cappa, cuculla, toral, femoralia, perizomata, and other garments agrees fairly well with a clothing list in the nearly contemporary Old English monastic sign-language text. Unfortunately neither these nor other Anglo-Saxon documentary sources reveal much specific about the look of monastic habits. The terms Bata uses may, moreover, have been lifted from class glossaries and so not reflect his own house's customs.

One final detail in Bata's talk of clothing raises questions concerning real practices in a different, important sphere: corporal punishment. About his need for new clothes a puer gripes, 'femoralia quoque non habeo, nisi cruentata cum urgis nuper uapulata.' In a later episode, Bata scripts the punishment of an allegedly cleptomaniacal oblate: the master deputizes two of the wretch's peers (possibly his accusers) to bring switches, then he orders: 'stet unus in dextera parte culi illius et alter in sinistra, et sic inuicem percutite super culum eius et dorsum, et flagellate eum bene prius, et ego uolo postea'. The master chides one punisher for not hitting hard enough and even jokes 'Non es mortuus adhuc' when the miscreant cries that he feels as if he is dying. In a verbose lament, the boy continues: 'modo sanguis meus in terra manat, cum lacrimis cruor stillat, non est cruor lacrimarum sed uulnerum.' The lash was one of many forms of monastic punishment, and the Colloquies convey its unique terror for the young. Customaries recognize a preventative as well as punitive benefit to corporal punishment; applied with discretion, it was part of a larger ascetic program for forming the stainless monk-priest.\textsuperscript{44} Generally children were protected from delation and whipping in daily conventual Chapter; but in their own separate Chapter overseen by magistri, oblates were expected to accuse themselves or one another of faults and to receive punishment. Bowing to realism, some customaries limit their expectations of boys in so potentially sensitive a situation. Certain kinds of accusation were effectively disallowed, and in no customary known to me is any boy or adolescent still under custody ever deputized to whip a peer, as happens in Bata's Colloquy 28.\textsuperscript{45}

Bata's specific references to bloodshed are difficult to judge, as are his hints that culprits had to bare their backs or posteriors. For reasons of safety and collective modesty, the typical procedure appears to have been for offenders to remove the cowl but keep on the undershirt (staminea) during whippings. Bata's references to undressing for punishment are vague, mentioning only the cowl explicitly.\textsuperscript{46} The thief's testimony that his 'blood drips with tears' cannot be taken too seriously: the words come verbatim from Isidore's Synonyma, and some eleventh-century authors coloured their descriptions of boys' being whipped to evoke the Holy Innocents.\textsuperscript{47} Before dismissing Bata's gorier details as embellishment, however, it should be noted that oblates do seem to have faced unusually harsh discipline at Fleury. There, in children's Chapter, boys up to age fifteen stripped bare to the waist for lashings by a master whose job Thierry of Amorbach grimly describes: 'terribilibus solet verberibus latera eorum cruentare'.\textsuperscript{48} Most unusually, Thierry requires older boys (adolescentiores) whipped in regular conventual Chapter to strip in the same fashion, even though this requires some exquisite choreography since 'vereundie est permaxime monacum nudum videri'.\textsuperscript{49}

So far I have considered mainly patterns in the Colloquies difficult to reconcile with a wide array of reformist customs (some of which, admittedly, may have had no correlates in Anglo-Saxon England). Yet among these irregularities also occur, as noted, plausible details about clothing, punishment, and bathing. Likewise, Bata's descriptions of eating and drinking may be less outrageous than they are reputed to be (Pierre Riché regarded the quantities of alcohol guzzled in the Colloquies as 'unworthy even of English monasticism').\textsuperscript{50} Normative sources show considerable latitude about oblates' diets, and Hildemar allows younger boys to eat meat, provided they are weaned from the custom as adolescents. Customaries typically reserve meat-eating for the sick, but monastic diets normally included fish and animal products such as cheese and eggs, and supplementary rounds of drink including beer, mead, and sweetened wine proliferated even at reformed centres. Bata's mentions of flesh-meat and frequent drinking are therefore not uniformly scandalous in themselves. The problems lie rather in uncensored portrayals of excessive consumption and chatter in the refectory, a space where, as in the dormitory, interactions were strictly curtailed.
The Irregular Life in Ælfric Bata's Colloquies

Any catalogue of the believably irregular in the Colloquies will also include their references to private property, work-for-pay, recreations for the boys, and social excursions outside the monastery. While regulation variously forbade all these, they were, like meat-eating and excess drinking, mentioned often enough in monastic literature to amount to commonplaces about unideal monkhood. As such topoi were rarely disengaged from polemic, Bata must have known that they would stir his audience's expectations for some kind of morally redeeming point. Such a point, if he had one, is hard to identify. Had he wished to illustrate vice in order to reinforce good conduct, he might have done so more clearly with only minor adjustments: his scenarios about latrine-visits, for example, could have launched exchanges upholding custody ('May I accompany this brother to the latrine?' 'Not unless he is a magister and a third goes with you!'). In the absence of such gestures, it is nevertheless still possible to consider the transgressiveness of the Colloquies anew by viewing them first within the wider range of contemporary motives for describing monastic misbehaviour, then within the problematic history of reform at Bata's probable home, Canterbury.

Reading monastic undiscipline

The Colloquies are hardly unique in representing lapses of discipline as part of monastic life. Histories and hagiography do so too, and, from the twelfth century, criticism of bad monks would become a veritable genre. Late-Anglo-Saxon communities received famous critiques from Eadmer and William of Malmesbury, both invoking already ancient clichés about monastic worldliness. Some attributes of Bata's monks echo the same stereotypes, yet without the plain motives of an Eadmer or William out to justify Norman domination, or even of a Gerald of Wales avenging perceived 'Cluniac' obstructions to his own career. Did Bata have comparable agendas that we simply cannot see? Some wider antagonism seems all the more necessary to explain how such a man could have been appointed magister at Canterbury, either St Augustine's or Christ Church
Christopher A. Jones

Cathedral Priory (I view the latter as more likely). Insofar as either was reformed to even approximately Æthelwoldian standards, the job of its magistri should have been to uphold custody as well as teach Latin. Yet the Colloquies nearly invert the emphases that the customaries or Hildemar assign to disciplina and custodia. Excess of the former and deficiency of the latter make Bata's picture of oblation a grotesque of the reformed ideal.

Critical responses to contradictions so extreme have tended two ways. One is ad hominem, making Bata a rogue who stayed a monk by inertia or compulsion. The practice of oblation probably meant that monasteries housed more such persons than the rare known examples betray (such as Gottschalk at Fulda). Osbern and Eadmer knew of Bata by reputation as a would-be despoiler of Christ Church, so he may in fact have been a bad seed. If so, however, what that means for the Colloquies is none the clearer: a vindictive monk might seek to embarrass his community by documenting actual misbehaviours, inventing them outright, or mixing truth and slander.

A more provocative response to Bata's curious amorality is to question how deeply reform actually implicated him and his peers. Suspicions on this count may begin with the generic backgrounds of the Colloquies themselves. Bata drew on the straight-laced Colloquy by his reformist teacher Ælfric of Eynsham, but his other sources lay farther afield. Porter has shown that Bata modeled some of his scenarios on ones in an earlier text, the Colloquia e libro De raris fabulis retractata (or Retractata, for short), which in turn drew on the earlier collection De raris fabulis. The latter was composed before c. 900 in Wales or Cornwall, hence remote in time and place from the Anglo-Saxon monastic reform. Unsurprisingly, the De raris fabulis reflects institutions and terminology that are 'monastic' only in a broad pre-reformed sense. It is surely striking, then, that some of Bata's episodes flouting silence and custodia in zones of particular anxiety to the reformers - the refectory, dormitory, bathing-house, and latrines - ultimately bear, via the Retractata, the impress of the pre-reformed De raris fabulis.

The debts of the Colloquies to these models still do not explain why Bata risked setting inadequately adapted scenarios before his students, or why his superiors would tolerate him as master if they took more seriously than he the objectives of Æthelwoldian-style reform. Beneath the latter 'if' of course lies the real question: in reading the Colloquies against normative texts of tenth- and eleventh-century reformed pedigree, are we using a standard to which Bata and his house truly aspired? The possibility that houses directly or indirectly joined to Æthelwold's legacy could flout his progressive customs may be remote. But the Winchester ambit did not include the Canterbury communities, historically exceptional in any case. If Christ Church was Bata's home, the uncertain progress of reform there further complicates the problem. The claims of spurious charters notwithstanding, little evidence supports that the cathedral chapter was purged of clerks and monasticized at one stroke; the change rather appears to have proceeded gradually well into the eleventh century. However far it had gone by 1011, Danish attacks on the city in that year were later remembered as having claimed the lives of so many monks that the next monastic archbishop, Lyfing, was forced to replenish his chapter from the ranks of secular clergy.61

Accurate or not, the memory of a disciplinary slump at Canterbury recalls other narratives of monastic misfortune, some surprisingly helpful for imagining how a character such as Bata might have risen to important rank, or what his seeming indifference to new reforms could betoken. Perhaps the most instructive analogies lie at St Gall in the work of Bata's younger contemporary, Ekkehard IV, whose anecdotes of monastic undiscipline have also seemed enigmatically motivated. Writing perhaps c. 1050, Ekkehard relates how his abbey's destruction by fire in 937 forced the otherwise strict abbot, Craloh, to relax discipline. Compounding these hardships, Craloh had to accept as schoolmaster the arrogant monk Victor, whose hatred of the abbot divided the community and later ended in violence. Most arresting is the detail that 'cuius [scil. odii] scintillas, quaqua potuit, Victor inflammavit, propter quod et ipsi in scolis, quas ei commiserat, plura incommodasset severius inconsulto eo cum pueris agendo'. The moment resonates with Bata's whipping-scenes and with the aforementioned anecdote by Osbern about the Christ Church oblates' flight from bullying magistri.63 The plausible lesson is that abused or neglected youths were sometimes pawns in the sort of intracommunal struggle that Ekkehard exceptionally details. Victor's career attests that even under a strict abbot, circumstances could land the oblates under the power of someone willing not just to abuse his position but to do so calculatedly.64

St Gall provides other lessons potentially relevant to Bata, especially concerning the resistance to reform typical of old, proud monastic houses. Ekkehard's narrative has been interpreted as a defense of St Gall's adherence to the Rule against Lotharingian reformers' perennial charges of laxness. (In 1034 reformers actually imposed their own abbatial candidate, Nopert, on Ekkehard's community.) Faults that reformers long decried at St Gall, such as permissiveness about meat-eating and personal property, recall attributes of Bata's monks, as does a tolerance at St Gall for relatively frequent holidays by the scola. Granted, at its most topsy-turvy Ekkehard's St Gall is still a more sober, orderly place than
Christopher A. Jones

Bata's. The point, simply, is that Ekkehard in effect pleads no contest to what lapses he does acknowledge, chiefly because he and his brothers consider themselves upholders of an ancient, more authentically Benedictine observance than reformers brought. His community's failings, such as they were, Ekkehard attributes mainly to vicissitudes natural and man-made.

Of the two Canterbury communities, St Augustine's is perhaps the one that we would expect to mimic such venerable holdouts against reform as St Gall or, for that matter, Fulda or Fleury.

For its part, early-eleventh-century Christ Church could regard itself as an old 'Benedictine' house only through a trick of historical imagination, albeit one now recognized as characteristic of Anglo-Saxon reformers. On their view, Bede appeared to confirm that, from its Gregorian plantation, the English church had been not only monastic but monastic stricto sensu, with its first archbishop a monk served by a familia of the same.

Thus inspired, more than one Christ Church monk in the decades to either side of 1000 may have wondered why his community should adopt any customs imposed from outside. Belief in a 'Benedictine' pre-Viking-Age church, with Canterbury's Cathedral Priory as its head, made more logical a flow of custom in the opposite direction, from Christ Church as a type of Musterkloster. Naturally, such logic availed little against political realities that had already assigned Æthelwold's Abingdon or Winchester something like the role accorded Benedict of Aniane's Kornelimünster. But against intruded novelties of custom, Christ Church may have nurtured a sense of historic independence much as it did in the liturgy, where its Office remained loyal to the Roman Psalter over the recently fashionable Gallican.

Such conservatism joins other attributes to make the monastery of Bata's Colloquies resemble more and more the bustling, open complex that recent studies have seen in the great, late-Carolingian houses, 'Benedictine' and perhaps grudgingly Anianian but not yet reformed in tenth-century moulds.

That this was to some extent the case at urban Christ Church is plausible, notwithstanding any local effects of the Danish onslaught in 1011. There a turn to customs 'reformed' along actually current continental lines may have had to wait for the reign of the Confessor, if not the arrival of Lanfranc. This does not mean that other cultural achievements associated with monastic reform in Anglo-Saxon England did not flourish at Christ Church from Dunstan through Stigand. Undoubtedly some did, especially the copying and decoration of books or the composition of new liturgical forms. Nevertheless, well into the eleventh century even the 'monastic' books copied at Christ Church can send mixed signals. The volume famously inscribed with Bata's name, Cotton Tiberius A. iii, is emblematic of this ambivalence, being an archive for pointedly old-fashioned texts (the Rule and its Carolingian supplements), alongside products of recent reform (the Regularis concordia, the Monasteriales indicia) but also much else not monastic in any particular sense. Given the manuscript's Old English glosses that make the Rule, its supplements, and the Concordia vehicles for learning Latin language as much as custom, these parts of Tiberius A. iii approach the look of something monumental demoted to workaday service, like temple statuary used for garden planters.

The arrival of more current European custom at Christ Church is just one measure of monastic reform and one that, the suspicion grows, can be considered independently from others. Bata's assumed witness either to a decline of Anglo-Saxon reformed monasticism or to the unrealism of its prescriptions deserves qualification accordingly. Beyond allowing for his humour and debts to older textual models, we should consider that some aspects of the Colloquies outrageous by reformed standards of the day appear less so if Bata's context was one of transition, even surly or spiteful resistance, to new strictures being imposed from above or without. The implications of such antagonism reach beyond Bata, placing in a new light, for example, the notorious absence of any non-spurious Christ Church voice celebrating the chapter's monasticization. Tensions between what Joyce Hill has called 'reform and resistance' make the lone contemporary voice that may survive from this transition – Bata's – less unaccountable. When the monks of tenth-century Fulda encountered reformist pressure, Widukind of Corvey grumbled at the arrogance of the Lotharingian zealots: 'Gravisque persecutio monachis oritur in diebus illis, affirmantibus quibusdam pontificibus, melius arbitrati paucos vita claros quam plures negligentes inesse monasterii oportere'. Like Widukind, who contradicted such fervour with Christ's parable of the wheat and tares (Matthew 13. 24-30), Bata probably would have sympathized with the Fulda monks – and realized that their days were numbered.

251
NOTES

7 For the state of research, see references in Isabelle Cochelin, 'Évolution des coutumiers monastiques dessinée à partir de l'étude de Bernard', in From Dead of Night to End of Day: The Medieval Cluniac Customs, ed. by Susan Boynton and Isabelle Cochelin, Disciplina monastica, 3 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005), pp. 29-66. On English customaries, see my 'Monastic Custom in Early Norman England', Revue bénédictine, 115 (2003), 135-68 and 302-36 (pp. 135-37 and 143-48).

8 These views represent reaction to Kassius Hallinger's Gorze-Kluny: Studien zu den monastischen Lebensformen und Gegensätzen im Hochmittelalter, Studia Anselmiana, 22-25, 2

9 See Regularis concordia 5 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 71-73 and commentary) and incisive remarks by Wormald, 'Æthelwold', pp. 30-31.

14 See, e.g., the Carolingian Memoriale qualiter 8 (ed. by C. Morgand, CCM I (1963; 2nd edn 1989), 239, commentary to line 5). Possibly the eleventh-century Cluniac Liber tramitis 154 (ed. by Peter Dinter, CCM X (1980), 220) allows some free but still monitored talk in the scola.

16 See Maria Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer der Kinder: Ein Beitrag zur Liturgie- und Sozialgeschichte des Mönchtums im hohen Mittelalter, Münsteraner theologische

17 Good overviews of custody are de Jong, 'Growing Up', distilling the mid-ninth-century commentary on Benedict's Rule by Hildemar of Corbie: see Vita et regula SS. P. Benedicti una cum expositione regulae, III: Expositio regulae ab Hildemaro tradita, ed. by Rupertus Mittermüller (Regensburg: Pustet, 1880), esp. capp. 22 and 37 (pp. 337 and 418). For degrees of custody, see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 106-14.

19 Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 199-200, 357-58, and 406-07. On physical imitation in the oblates' training, see Isabelle Cochelin, 'Besides the Book: Using the Body to Mould the Mind – Cluny in the Tenth and Eleventh Centuries', in Medieval Monastic Education (op. cit. in note 15 above), pp. 21-34.

20 Regularis concordia 12 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 76-77); I translate: '[The elder monks] shall not presume to take any one [of the boys or youths] aside alone for the purpose of some private request or even under the pretense of some spiritual matter; but rather the youth should remain always under the watchful care of his minder, and not even the minder should be permitted to go about with any individual boy without the presence of a third to stand as witness.' Limiting abbots' discretion here is unusually strict; cf. Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 353-56.

22 'a boy beneath the rod.'

24 Osbern, Miracula sancti Dunstani 15 (ed. by William Stubbs, Memorials of St Dunstan, Rolls Series, 63 (London: Longman, 1874), pp. 140-42); cf. Eadmer, Miracula sancti Dunstani 12 (Memorials of St Dunstan, ed. by Stubbs, pp. 229-31). Note the Dunstan of this vision counters the bad magistri in the anecdote and does so while honouring custom to the letter, using the virga rather than his hand to touch the visionary boy.
The Irregular Life in Ælfric Bata's Colloquies

25 Colloquy 20 (p. 122, trans. p. 123): 'I don't dare kiss you, brother'. Unless the older monk is a magister, custody has already been violated by his addressing the boy and asking him to come sit down next to him for a while. Cf. Colloquy 25 (p. 140) and Porter's introduction, p. 14.

26 Colloquies 5 and 24 (pp. 88 and 132). Porter, supposing that there is just one senior magister (Conversations, p. 8), wonders if plural 'masters' mentioned in Colloquy 6 (p. 92) were older members of the ordo infantum. But other sources often speak of multiple magistri (e.g. Hildemar, Expositio regulae 22 (ed. by Mittermüller, pp. 331-32); Lanfranc's Decreta 109 (ed. by David Knowles, CCM III (1967), 95)) or of mature monks acting as solatia to the headmaster (Floriacenses antiquiores 18 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 30)). On magistri generally, see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 344-50 and 352-53.

27 That boys carried out menial chores, especially in the refectory, is attested by, e.g., Hildemar's Expositio regulae 37 (ed. by Mittermüller, p. 418); cf. Bata's Colloquy 8 and Difficiliora 1 (pp. 94-98 and 178). But refectory- and kitchen-duties were closely supervised; see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 297-300.

28 Colloquies 2 and 12, respectively (pp. 80-82 and 110). A boy who sleeps through Nocturns in Colloquy 12 pleads that a fellow oblate was supposed to wake him; but cf. Hildemar, Expositio regulae 22 (ed. by Mittermüller, pp. 335-36), forbidding boys to perform this function for one another. In Ælfric of Eynsham's Colloquy, the master's virga rousts an oblate from bed (ed. by Garmonsway, p. 48).

29 Colloquies 9 and 10 (pp. 98 and 108); cf. sources surveyed by Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 315-20, and Gerd Zimmermann, Ordensleben und Lebenstandard: Die Cura Corporis in den Ordensvorschriften des abendländischen Hochmittelalters, Beiträge zur Geschichte des alten Mönchtums und des Benediktinerordens, 32 (Münster: Aschendorff, 1973), pp. 120-22. But cf. Hildemar's Expositio regulae 22 (ed. by Mittermüller, p. 234), not mentioning a third party on nightly latrine-visits. Details in Bata's descriptions are unclear: in Colloquy 10 the boy may be carrying a lantern; in 9 the fact that the requester needs guidance and sleeps (apparently) in a room other than the dormitory implies that he is a visiting monk (yet custody around strangers was supposed to be strictest of all; see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 180-81).

30 Expositio regulae 22 (ed. by Mittermüller, pp. 332-33). Hildemar refers to these two species of offense together again in cap. 29 (ed. by Mittermüller, pp. 365 and 369).

31 Floriacenses antiquiores 28 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 41-42); I translate: 'the beds of the small boys should never be placed here and there among the beds of the brethren but rather in the middle of the dormitory where lanterns hang, so that [the boys] can be seen from every angle. Indeed it is a hazard and great danger for boys to live in the midst of spiritual men, since from this often arises greatest scandal and the ruin of places.'
Christopher A. Jones

Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 261-68, surveys pertinent sources and argues against the inference (e.g., by Quinn, Better Than the Sons, p. 63) that children typically slept in a separate dormitory.

The abbot, however, would not be woken (thus Colloquy 11); cf. Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 263-64.

Colloquy 23 (p. 130).

Zimmermann, Ordensleben, pp. 124-26. Against monks' being seen naked while bathing, see Floriacenses antiquiores 12 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 23). In Lanfranc's Decreta 7, the young are barred from assisting older bathers, novices from bathing with oblates (CCM III (1967), 11). Customaries otherwise say little about children's baths; Lahaye-Geusen infers the occurrence was rare owing in part to strains it placed on the custody-system (Das Opfer, p. 312; cf. Quinn, Better Than the Sons, pp. 132-33).

Colloquies 1 and 2 refer to washing hands and faces daily upon rising: boys wake, put on their stockings and night shoes, visit the latrine, then wash, all before going to church for the first Office (presumably Nocturns). Cf. Regularis concordia 23 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 85) and Ælfric's Letter 2 (ed. by Jones, p. 110) which first describe this daily washing at a later point, i.e. before Terce in Winter (before Prime in Summer). Before Nocturns these latter sources explicitly mention only a visit to the latrine, but other customaries do describe a first washing before Nocturns; see Zimmermann, Ordensleben, pp. 118-19; Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 307-10.

On monastic garb, see Hallinger, Gorze-Kluny, ii, 681-83, 689-92, 695-96, and 715-30; Zimmermann, Ordensleben, pp. 88-107. Boys used essentially the wardrobe of adult monks; see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 53 n. 31 and 302-06.

See Conversations, p. 39, and minor discrepancies between lists in Colloquy 26 (already discussed) and Colloquy 1: 'ficones [. . .] et pedules et ocreas' (p. 80; cf. Porter's translation, p. 81: 'shoes, stockings, and leggings'); Colloquy 14: stropheum 'belt', interulum 'shirt', tractorium 'boothook', ficones 'shoes', duae manicae 'sleeves' [or perhaps 'gloves'], duae ocreae uel pedules 'a pair of leggings or stockings', duo ficones seu subtulares 'a pair of shoes or slippers' (p. 114, translation p. 115).

256

42 Colloquy 26 (p. 160, translation p. 161): 'I don't have any trousers save for the bloody ones from when I was beaten with rods a while back.'

43 Colloquy 28 (pp. 166 and 168, translation pp. 167 and 169): 'One boy stand on the right side of his ass and one on the left. Take turns beating his ass and back. First you two beat him well and I will afterwards [...] 'You're not dead yet' [...] 'Now my blood lies on the earth and my blood drips with tears. It is not the blood of tears, but of wounds'.

44 The point is often made in studies of the Colloquies, both Bata's (see Conversations, pp. 8-9, 12, and 14; Riché, 'Les moines bénédictins', pp. 103-04) and Ælfric of Eynsham's (ed. by Garmonsway, pp. 18-19 and 45). On corporal punishment in customaries, see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 380-99.

45 On children's Chapter, see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 117-18, 275, and 368-72; Quinn, Better Than the Sons, pp. 65 and 116-27.

46 Colloquies 6 and 18 (pp. 92 and 170) on dressing/undressing for punishment. On the rarity of whipping bare skin, see Floriacenses antiquiores 18 and 32 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 31, commentary to line 6; also 51, commentary to ll. 3-4 and 6).

48 Floriacenses antiquiores 18 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 31); I translate: 'he customarily bloodies their flanks with horrific beatings'. Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 394-95, takes the passage for hyperbole but grants that punishments were comparatively harsh at Fleury.

49 Floriacenses antiquiores 32 (CCM VII/3 (1984), 51): 'it is the ultimate embarrassment for a monk to be seen naked' (my translation, aided by the French of Anselme Davril and others in L'Abbaye de Fleury en l'an mil, Sources d'histoire médiévale, 32 (Paris: Éditions CNRS, 2004), p. 234). Problematically, other monastic texts can use nudus for 'stripped' only of the outer cuculla; see Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, p. 394.

50 'Les moines bénédictins', pp. 106-7. Colloquy 8 (p. 98) has an older monk goad a younger to eat and drink excessively.

51 Zimmermann, Ordensleben, pp. 58-64 and 67-71; Quinn, Better Than the Sons, pp. 127-28; Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 276-86. Eating and drinking abound in Colloquies 8, 9, 21, the opening of 24, and Difficiliora 1 and 12; cf. Monasteriales indicia 57-78 and 83-86 (ed. by Banham, pp. 32-38).

53 For property see Colloquies 14, 20, and 28 (beginning); in Colloquy 24 boys negotiate wages for copywork; for playtime, see Colloquy 7 and cf. Hildemar, Expositio regulae 37 (ed. by Mittermüller, p. 419); Lahaye-Geusen, Das Opfer, pp. 274-75. For frivolous trips from the monastery see Colloquy 21.

55 On Bata's career, see Conversations, pp. 1-3 and 208-09. Favouring Christ Church are an inscription in Cotton Tiberius A. iii (see Gneuss, 'Origin', pp. 23-24, and below) and the grudges of Osbern and Eadmer (see following note). Favouring St Augustine's are Bata's references to an 'abbot' over his community and the St Augustine's provenance of the Cambro-Latin De raris fabulis (see Scott Gwara, 'Education in Wales and Cornwall in the Ninth and Tenth Centuries: Understanding De raris fabulis', Hughes Memorial Lectures, 4 (Cambridge: ASNAC, 2004), pp. 12-13), on which see my discussion below. Nicholas Brooks, The Early History of the Church of Canterbury: Christ Church from 597 to 1066 (Leicester: Leicester University Press, 1984), pp. 277-78, allows that some monks in this period moved between the two Canterbury houses.

56 For this view see Conversations, pp. 12-15; on Osbern and Eadmer, Conversations, pp. 3 and 208-09. On Gottschalk and other rebellious nutriti, see de Jong, In Samuel's Image, pp. 77-99 and 219.

The Irregular Life in Ælfric Bata's Colloquies

E.g., speech during horae incompetentes = Retractata 1-2 from De raris fabulis 1-2 (texts cited from editions by Gwara, as note 57 above); refectory = Retractata 6 from De raris fabulis 6; dormitory and bed-making = Retractata 18 from De raris fabulis 18; bathing = Retractata 20 from De raris fabulis 20; latrine = Retractata 12 from De raris fabulis 11; kissing = Retractata 9 from De raris fabulis 11; boy left alone to guard an elder's property = Retractata 5 from De raris fabulis 5 (cf. Conversations, p. 8 n. 19).

Brooks, Early History, pp. 255-66. Tardy reform also explains Christ Church's relative uninterest in relic cults; see Alan Thacker, 'Cults at Canterbury: Relics and Reform under Dunstan and His Successors', in St Dunstan: His Life, Times, and Cult, ed. by Nigel Ramsay and others (Woodbridge: Boydell, 1992), pp. 221-45.

Ekkehard IV, Casus sancti Galli 70 (ed. and trans. by Hans Haefele, Ausgewählte Quellen zur deutschen Geschichte des Mittelalters, 10 (Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1980), p. 148). Departing from Haefele's German rendering, I translate: 'Victor, so far as he could, fanned into flame the sparks of hatred [against Craloh]; to that end, even in the school which Craloh had entrusted to him, Victor caused many difficulties for the abbot by acting very harshly towards the boys without his permission.'

See note 24, above. Brooks (Early History, p. 266) dates the events of the anecdote to 1066.

Several factors, including aristocratic connections at the Ottonian court, enabled Victor's challenges to Craloh; see Iso Müller, 'Ekkehart IV. und die Ratoromanen', Studien und Mitteilungen zur Geschichte des Benediktinerordens und seiner Zweige, 82 (1971), 271-88 (pp. 272-75).

Wormald, 'Æthelwold', pp. 39-41; also Antonia Gransden, 'Traditionalism and Continuity during the Last Century of Anglo-Saxon Monasticism', Journal of Ecclesiastical History, 40 (1989), 159-207 (pp. 162-68). The character of regular life at Christ Church in earlier centuries, especially after reforms by Archbishop Wulfred (805-32), is disputed; see Blair, The Church, p. 125 with references.

70 Jones, 'Monastic Custom', pp. 161-68.

73 Res gestae saxonicae 2.37 (ed. by H. E. Lohmann, 5th rev. edn by Paul Hirsch, MGH SSRG in usum scholarum, 60 (Hannover: Hahn, 1935), p. 98); I translate, 'In those days there arose against the monks a hard persecution, to which certain bishops gave their approval as they deemed it more fitting for a few men of outstanding life to inhabit the monasteries than crowds of slack ones'.